state of affairs here is evident. That which is evident does not require explanation." We also, in conformity to your majesty's commands, mentioned to his highness in a becoming and suitable manner, whatever there was to state upon the subject of friendship and attachment. His highness replied, "In consideration of the complexion of the times, the state of which is manifest, and that the support of the religion of Mahomed in this country entirely depends upon the sultana, my nightly and daily prayer is offered up for his good." He then said to the princes, "Oh! my sons! if my life and property can be of any service to you, God is witness that I will not refuse them to you." He then gave orders to the superintendant of the gardens to carry every day fruits and flowers to the princes, before his (the nabob's) own children; and said to us, "You are not acquainted with the state and order of affairs here. Consider me from my heart your well-wisher and sincere friend; and at all times be assured, that in whatever I may be able to effect your benefit, either by word or deed, I will not decline my exertions. What I said and wrote to his ldp upon the subject of making peace, God well knows who was then or is now desirous of it. His ldp, however, possessed uncontrouled authority, was a man of wisdom, and listened to the advice of others, and my observations made an impression upon me. God preserve you and me from the wicked designs of others." Major Doveton and another officer being of the party, his highness appeared to them, observing, that they had been present at the time, and could speak to the truth or falsity of what he said. Major Doveton replied, that it was very true; and that several English gentlemen were consequently much displeased with his highness. That one day, when his highness had assembled all the gentlemen, under pretence of giving them an entertainment, but really for the above purpose, and had accordingly suggested pacific measures, the expediency of which he urged in a thousand ways, they were so displeased that they went away without partaking of the entertainment; nay, that to their animosity might be attributed the assumption of his highness's country: that when the orders were received from the king of England to restore the country, they framed the pretence among themselves that his highness was too much attached to Tippoo Sultaun; and that the restitution of his country would consequently be an impolitic measure: but his ldp maintained his opinion singly, and, disregarding the animosity of all the others against his highness, delivered to him (his highness) the country, agreeably to the directions of his majesty. The story is very long. We have only written to your majesty a very small part of it. At present the commanding officer of the fort, and the other English gentlemen who are here, behave towards the nawaub Wallajah as if they were his servants. The princes staid two hours with his highness, and at the time of departure were presented by him with two khellauts of embroidery for the tenach, two kulgas, and two surpaishes of the finest jewels. We made endless apologies, and requested that he would excuse our acceptance of them. He said, "This is a festival, and I have given to my sons and my whole family new garments. These are also my children, and I entertain for them even a greater degree of regard, and I must not neglect them; these things possess little value, and it is not your province to interpose between me and my children." In like manner his highness presented Gholau Ali Khaun with a khellaut, consisting of a khulgu and surpaish, me with a surpaish and khellaut, and Shirkh Soliman Khan with another. He then took a hand of each of the princes, and descending from the upper part of his house, accompanied them to the outer door of the toshuk honnah, when he took leave of them. Omdut ul Omrah, and his other sons, attended them to the road, where they left them, after seeing them into their palanquins, and the nabob at parting embraced them with the greatest warmth.—We have thus communicated to your majesty the particulars of the friendly conduct of the nabob Walajah and the other sirdars; in fact, the disposition of all ranks of people is equally favourable, for whenever the princes go out any where, thousands of them stand in the street, and offer up prayers for your majesty's prosperity. On festivals and on Fridays in congregation, all the Mussulmans first offer up their prayers for your majesty's preservation. May God fulfil them! Upon our return dancing girls and musicians, &c. were sent with the prince's retinue, and after our arrival at the prince's house, and sitting there for two hours, danced, and were then dismissed.

No. 5.—Extract from a Letter from Tippoo Sultaun to Ali Rezza Khan and Gholau Ali Khan; dated at Seringapatam, the 16th of Hujree, of the Year Schir 1220 from the Birth of Mahomed.

I have received and understood the contents of your arzee, intimating the distinguished kindness and regard with which the nawaub Wallajah treats my sons, and the sincere friendship which he entertains towards me. It is evident that the nawaub is a pillar of the Mahomedan religion, the elect of the Almighty, a man of dignity and worldly experience; whatever favour and attention he may shew towards my sons, who are his guests, and you, I shall assuredly consider as a kindness conferred upon myself. This circumstance has afforded me much pleasure. My hopes from Almighty God and his divine messenger are, that the nawaub will do whatever may tend to the support of the religion of Mahomed, and that he will give the necessary attention to this point. You will mention to him that he must consider my sons as his own: that, in conformity to the command of God and the prophet, the improvement of Friendship among the professors of Islamism will be beneficial to various concerns both spiritual and temporal, and that, deeming me attached to our common religion and to his highness's person, he will direct his attention accordingly; you will also state to the nawaub the other points of friendship, which you have repeatedly heard from my mouth.

No. 7. Translation of a Letter from Gholaum Ali Khan to Tippoo Sultan.

The departure of Ali Khan at this time, in conformity to the orders of the presence, is very expedient, especially for the purpose of bringing to a favourable issue the propositions of Id Cornwallis, and the well-wishers of mankind, (the designation of the nabob Welajah in the cypher,) which is most ardently to be wished. There are many points which cannot be committed to paper, and can only be communicated in person; at this time the friendship and good will of both sirdars is from God, and the royal auspices: The particulars of this summary, which is an unlooked for good, will be made known to your majesty by the verbal representations of Ali Rezza, who attends the presence especially for that purpose; although it is contrary to the rules of respect to presume to give an opinion upon this subject, yet I am emboldened by my long attachment and my sense of the duty I owe your majesty; when your majesty shall have maturely deliberated upon and fully brought home to your mind the representation of both the sirdars, from a consideration of the changeableness of the times, your majesty's agreeing to this affair (upon the principle recommended in the words of Haiz, of Shiraz; the mercy of God be upon him! With Friends, cordiality; with enemies, dissimulation) seems highly expedient and advantageous to your Majesty's interests.

No. 8.---Translation of a Copy of a Letter from Tippoo Sultan to the Nawaub Welajah.

In the name of the most merciful God! After reiterated praises and unbounded adoration to the Almighty, who assembled the body of Mussulmans under the banners of Mahomed, and lighted the torch of mutual attachment among them, and praise to the chosen of prophets, who promulged the saying, "All Mussulmans are brothers," and took upon himself the task of intercession for all believers; and after intimating my desire of being personally known to your highness, and which, as it exceeds the power of the pen to describe, must be left to the heart to conceive, I have the honour to represent that the receipt of your highness's kind letter, after so long a lapse of time—(according to the saying, "all things depend upon the appointed season")—rejoiced me extremely, and your highness's obliging recollection of me excited my acknowledgments, and I return thanks to Almighty Providence for the joyful news of the welfare of the well-wisher of mankind (meaning the Nawaub himself); my delaying to address your highness has been owing to my not having been favoured with any letters from your highness. By the grace of God, your highness is pre-eminent, characterized for all praise-worthy qualities, and acquainted with all affairs. It is probable that your highness's delay in writing to me may have been occasioned by the particular circumstances of the times, and in consequence I also have delayed to write, else I should have written to you an hundred times. Now by the receipt of your highness's letter, and the account of your highness's friendship and attachment, which I have had from the verbal communication of the high in rank, the distinguished in friendship, (key to the cypher) the trusty, I am certain that (according to the words of the prophet, the union of the Mussulmans is as that of the soul with the body) that warmth of attachment, original affection, implanted among Mussulmans, exists between us. My hope from Almighty God, and my confidence in the prophet is, that according to the command of God, and of the prophet, which is well known to all Mussulmans, all the faithful will exert themselves with heart and soul in maintaining and rendering permanent the religion of Mahomed upon your highness, who is one of the heads of the faith; this is an absolute duty, and I am confident that your highness will by all means constantly employ your time in performing what is obligatory on you; and I am perfectly satisfied that you will shew that kindness which is becoming your exalted station, towards my two sons, your guests, and who are as your own. I hope that regarding me inwardly and as your well-wisher, and that of all Mussulmans, you will continue to rejoice me by letters; you will learn my fathers sentiments from the representations of the high in rank, the distinguished in friendship.

No. 9.—Translation of a Copy of a Letter from Tippoo Sultan to Omdut ul Omrah, the Nabob of the Carnatic.

After reiterating praises and unbounded adoration to the Almighty, who hath adorned the multitude of the professors of Islamism with the gem of religion, and lighted the torch of friendship for each other in the region of the heart, and endless thanks worthy of the last of the messengers of God (Mahomed) who with his prophetic tongue spoke this divine saying, "That all Mussulmans are brothers;" and who was pleased to take upon himself the task of intercession for all believers; and after intimating my desire of personal communications and which, as it exceeds the power of the pen to describe, must be left to the heart to conceive, I set forth my object: By the grace of God the most sincere attachment and perfect unanimity have from the beginning been established among the believers of the enlightened doctrine of Mahomed, but every event has its proper season, and hence no opportunity has yet offered for the external demonstration of our mutual regard. Now, however, the receipt of your kind letter, replete with the friendly sentiments with which our hearts are mutually impressed; has doubly added to my sincere attachment and cordial regard; when I learnt also from the intimation of the high in rank, the distinguished in friendship, the trusty, of your great and noble qualities, and the sincere friendship and cordiality you entertain towards me; my happiness was greater than language can adequately express; may God realize this source of happiness; that is to say, that perfect attachment and union among the followers of Islam, which is the greatest gift of the Almighty, and than which nothing is more essential to the temporal and eternal interests of mankind. May God render it attainable, and may he preserve us firm in the faith of Mahomed, the boundless benefits resulting from which will by the divine grace be manifested. I am confident that you will direct your attention to the adjustment of affairs between me and the well-wisher of mankind, who is the chief and principal of the professors of Islamism; and that deeming me from my heart your well-wisher, you will always keep me in your recollection by your friendly letters: All other particulars may be made known to you from the representations of the high in rank.—May prosperity and happiness attend you!

No. 10.—Translation of Letter from Gholam Ali Khan to Tippoo Sultaun. (Without Date.)

On the 2d of Rehmah of the year Sehri 1220, Mohammudee (14th Jan. 1793) the nabob Walajah sent a message by Khadir Nawaz Khan to this effect. Whatever animosity and estrangement formerly existed between us (meaning himself and Tippoo Sultaun) are now, thank God, completely removed. If the slightest trace of them remain in my heart, I am no Mussulman, nay of another sect; and on the part of the Hyderree Sircar, also I am confident the same friendly sentiments are entertained: God knows, and the prophet is witness, on the most deliberate reflection and deep consideration, I see no one sirdar who has at heart the interests of the true faith, except Tippoo Sultaun, and after him this sinner (of whom the same may be said in some degree). In the second place, the sight of the princes gives new force to the attachment and regard that my heart feels; indeed it is superfluous to express this; hence I offer up my most earnest prayers to God for the welfare of the sultaun, and the prosperity of the affairs of the Hyderree Sircar. From the impulse of these sentiments it is requisite that I should communicate some articles of intelligence, which are as follows: I have always kept stationed in Bengal several persons of the higher class, for the purpose of collecting and transmitting secret intelligence daily. In the paper of intelligence which came on the 25th of Rubuossance 1207 (10th of December 1793) it is stated, that sir Chs Mulet, the English resident at Poonah, has written to Id Cornwallis, that numerous messengers from the Khodadad Sircar pass to and fro between Seringapatam and Poonah; whence it would seem that Tippoo Sultaun was endeavouring to form a close connection and alliance with the Poonah govt, and through that govt with the mogul (Nizam Ali Khan); and that deeming this information of importance, he had written it to his ldp. The members of council in Bengal on hearing this, are said to have stated their opinion to his ldp that Tippoo Sultaun was infringing the settlement which had taken place between him and his ldp, and was entertaining views of a sinister nature; that, for example, the sultaun withheld payment of the kists, as prescribed in the treaty, and refused to release the European and other prisoners subjects of the comp.; that this sort of discourse had excited some degree of suspicion, nay even of alarm in his ldp's mind. Such is the present state of affairs: What, in the judgment of this well-wisher, now appears expedient is this, in a short time his ldp will go to Europe; the princes, please God, will soon return, and the kists are in a course of payment; after his ldp's departure the liquidation of the kists and other points, whatever may be his highness's (Tippoo's) pleasure, will be right and proper; at present it is better to be silent upon every thing, because at this time his highness's honour would at all events be called in question. When another shall arrive from Europe, the imputation will in every respect and in every measure fall upon him.

Note.—The following extract is preceded by an account of the nabob Walajah's having invited the princes to an exhibition of fireworks, on occasion of the eed or festival. The govt of Madras lent his garden for the purpose.

No. 11. Extract from a Letter from Gholam Ali Khan and Ali Rezza Khan, to Tippoo Sultaun; dated 22d Ahmedy of the Year Sehri 1221, A. N. M. (2d May 1793.)

The princes having arrived at the garden, the nawaub Walajah sent Omdut ul Omrah to them, desiring him to remain in attendance upon the princes as long as they should stay at the entertainment. Omdut ul Omrah accordingly attended the princes at the exhibition of fireworks until nine o'clock at night, when he took leave and went away. At parting Omdut ul Omrah said to us, "You will give my respectful compliments, by way of remembrance to his majesty, and inform him that he may consider me from my heart attached to him, and that, please God, at a proper occasion my fidelity towards him shall be made manifest to him."

No. 12.—Extract from a Letter from Gholam Ali Khan and Ali Rezza Khan, to Tippoo Sultaun; dated 25th Beharee of the Year Sehri 1221, A. N. M. (5th June 1793.)

Refuge of the world! Yesterday the well-wisher of mankind sent the following message by Khadar Newaz Khan: "At this time a complete rupture has taken place between the English and French. The story of the king of the French and their domestic commotions are well known. Six or seven European powers have united for the destruction of the French, and you will soon hear that the whole of the French territory has been divided amongst others. The English (troops) here at Madras will proceed in a day or two against Pondicherry. Although there is a body of troops in that place, yet domestic dissensions have risen to the utmost pitch there, and nothing will be done, and the place will at length be taken. My object in mentioning this event is this:—The vakeel of the Ahmedy Sircar, who was at Pondicherry, has lately, it seems, returned to the presence (Tippoo Sultaun). Please God, there is no doubt that the sultaun keeps in view all the ups and downs of the time. At this time no kind of assistance will be afforded; but out of that friendship which I feel for the sultaun, I recommend that the vakeel remain a short time at the presence, and also that epistolary correspondence be discontinued for a short time. Although a friendly connexion has long subsisted with the French on the part of the Ahmady Sircar, yet, considering the circumstances of the times, it is not advisable (that is to maintain an epistolary correspondence with the French); should there be any point of urgency to communicate, there is no objection to do it verbally. For God's sake, let not the sultaun ascribe what I say, to a wrong motive; I am actuated solely by my good wishes in making this communication. Since the day that a cordial union took place between us, let me be no longer a Mussulman, nor a servant of God, if I have not always offered up my prayers for the sultaun's good, and afterwards for my own. May the Almighty preserve firm and uninjured the Mahomedan church, and the safety of the sultaun!

No. 13.—Extract from a Letter from Gholaum Ali Khan and Alli Rezza Khan, to Tippoo Sultaun, dated 15th of Sumree, of the Year Sehri 1221, A.N.M. (23d July 1793.)

The nawaub Walajah has repeatedly sent word to us by Khadir Newaz Khan, that he had something of a secret nature which he wished to say to us in private; adding, that if we would go under pretence of seeing a mosque which his highness has built, he would send Omdut ul Omrah alone to meet us. Accordingly on the 17th of Tuckee (21st June 1793) we went to the mosque; whither Omdut ul Omrah repaired also. On the left of the mosque is the tomb of a celebrated devotee (by name Futtah Shah) who died about six months ago, and erected at his highness's expense. Under pretence of performing the fautebah (or prayers for the dead) Omdut ul Omrah took our hands and carried us into the tomb. When there he asked us whether we had full powers from your majesty, or were under the necessity of making reference upon every subject. We replied, that we had been a year and more in attendance here, during which period many points of business had been negotiated, and continued to be negotiated, by us; and that, please God, our proceedings were and would be approved and confirmed by your majesty; and that with his (Omdut ul Omrah's) knowledge of this, his question appeared very extraordinary to us. That it was proper to put to vakeels, that we were only servants and well-wishers of the sircars; and that we had powers to act in any thing that appeared to us calculated to promote your highness's interest and welfare; but in the other case not. Omdut ul Omrah was much pleased, and, smiling, said to us, "So it ought to be." He then delivered the following, on the part of the nawaub Walajah:—That for a very long time there had been, without a cause, a veil (or want of cordiality) between his highness and your majesty, which had been productive of injuries to both; but now that, by the favour of God, a system of harmony, such as is becoming among the professors of Islamism, had taken place, his highness confidently hoped from God, the prime cause of all, that the time past might be amply redeemed; that for his highness's own part, considering from his heart himself, his country, and his property, to belong to your majesty, he had made it a testamentary injunction to his children and family, taking God and his holy prophet to witness, to pray night and day for the pillar of faith; (that is to say) your majesty; and to consider their prosperity and welfare as inseparably connected with your majesty; that we must ascertain your majesty's wishes on this head in a manner satisfactory to both, and if your majesty should be, from your heart, solicitous of this proposed cordial harmony, his highness would, under the testimony of God and his prophet, detail to us his sentiments fully at the time of our departure, which, please God, would soon take place. May it please your majesty! His highness is in expectation of an answer from you to these points, and we shall represent to his highness whatever reply your majesty may direct us to make. Please God we shall hereafter have occasion to address your majesty, notifying our succession; the affairs you know of. May the sun of prosperity, &c.

No. 14.—Extract from a Letter from Gholaum Ali Khan and Alli Rezza Khan, to Tippoo Sultaun (without Date.)

Prior to this we communicated to your majesty the circumstances of the nawaub Omdut ul Omrah's coming to the mosque; our meeting there, and his communicating to us several points, with which particulars your majesty must ere this have become acquainted. On a subsequent day, the 3d of Sumree, we sent a message to him, purporting that we were going to the garden to see and arrange the effects we had with us; and that if he also would come there, under pretence of taking the air, we should be very happy. Accordingly on the next day we went to the garden with Omdut ul Omrah. We sat together for four hours, (about an hour and a half English); and Omdut ul Omrah discoursed in the most undisguised manner on the part of the nawaub Walajah, as well as on his own, of the sincerity of their friendship, attachment, and regard.—He also made use of some particular expressions of his attachment, requiring us upon oath not to commit them to writing, but to defer the communication of them until our return to your majesty. "Since" said he, "I have expressed myself as I have done merely from my regard for the faith, and from my friendship and goodwill towards the defender (or protector) of the faith. [Key to the cypher.] Please God, you will shortly be with his majesty, when you will communicate them in person." We answered, that we would act as he desired, and not divulge what he had said to any one.—Protector of the world! Concerning the affair with which your majesty is acquainted, we have, under suitable pleas, and a proper introduction, prevailed upon Omdut ul Omrah to lay the foundation of it, and he is exerting himself with zeal in this business. Please God, we will inform your majesty of the result.

No. 16.—Translation of a Letter from Gholam Alli Khan and Ali Rezza Khan to Tippoo Sultaun: dated the 24th of Jafree of the Year Sehir 1221, A.N.M. 31st Aug. 1793.

[After the usual form of address.]—We have had the honour to receive your majesty's two gracious letters, giving cover to a paper containing a form of obligation, and a question of orthodoxy, by the hands of Mahomed Bewan.—We assembled all the servants, high and low, belonging to the sircar, and communicated every thing to them; and enjoined them, that on the next day, which was Friday, they should all bathe, put on their best clothes, and attend us. On that day Gholam Alli Khan was indisposed (as he still continues), and therefore I, Ali Rēzza, carried all the servants of the sircar with me to the jaumah mosque: There were present the cauzy of the city, the khuttub, or preacher, Syed Mahomed, a person of great learning, and others, to the number of near a thousand; and likewise the sons of the nawaub Walajah. As it happened the kostba was well adapted to our purpose. After the Friday's prayers were over, I caused all of them to sit down, and first applied to the cauzy, and other persons of learning who were present, to have the kostba delivered in the Hindoostanny language, in order that every body might understand it. One of them accordingly explained the contents of the kostba, which comprized the command of God to wage holy wars, not to take to flight in combating with infidels; to form an union among all the professors of Islamism; and other obligations of the faith. I then asked the cauzy what was the law if any Mussulman acted contrary to these commands? to which the cauzy replied, That, according to the duties and obligations of Mussulmans, whoever neglected to act up to the commands was a sinner. Upon which I remarked it was very extraordinary that, notwithstanding the notoriety of this and the great plurality of Mussulmans, they should so depart from the obligations of the faith as to take up their abode in such a place, and choose to render obedience to those of a different persuasion. God grant it may turn out well for the Mussulmans of this place! I then said, it is written that the prayers which are offered up in the kostba in favour of a prince who fights for the faith, are accepted of God; but the prayers in favour of those who do not are rejected. Either reconcile the law in this instance to the care of him in [Shah Allum] whose name you have read the kostba, or else conform to the law; why are you knowingly guilty of sin? To this he replied, "All things depend upon their appointed season." After this I asked, according to the law of the faith, what was the duty of servants? he answered, The sentence of the khoran is plain, "Obey God and his prophet, and those of yourselves who are placed in authority over you."—In other words, the most high God hath blended obedience to the sovereign with obedience to himself, and to his messenger; hence it is incumbent upon all servants to do that which belongs to fidelity, and to the interests of religion. I answered, that although this, that is obedience to the pince, was a duty indiscriminately binding upon all Mussulmans, yet I wanted after prayers, the blessing of which I prayed might descend upon every individual, to take an obligation from the servants of the Khodadad Sircar. Accordingly, after I and all the servants of the Ahmady Sircar had finished the prayers in conformity to your majesty's commands, I addressed all the people and said, "The error of which ye have hitherto been guilty is, for the sake of God, and of his messenger, forgiven on the part of his majesty." Upon this they, one by one, arose and declared, that since all their errors had been forgiven on the part of your majesty, they now, under the testimony of God, his messenger, and the holy book, bound and engaged themselves, that hereafter, as long as they lived, their conduct should manifest nothing else than fidelity, devotion, truth, and zeal; that they would never be guilty of flight in the face of an enemy, of theft, of lying, of injuring, wishing ill, or of enmity towards those who wished well to the Khodadad state, nor of any thing that belonged to treachery and ingratitude; adding, that they would never swerve from this engagement a hair's breadth; that they would cultivate friendship and union with the followers of the faith, and among one another; that they considered the honour of all Mussulmans as an object of individual concern, and would never commit oppression and violence upon any one, either by word or deed. After this a tautchah (or service for the souls of the dead) was performed, and prayers that the khodadad sircar might be triumphant and victorious. We then came out of the mosque, and halting in the area of it, I took an engagement from the Hindoos with me to this effect; that as they derived their support from the Ahmady Sircar, they engaged upon oath, and upon the faith of their ponrauns, that they would be faithful to the duties committed to their charge; that their conduct should ever manifest fidelity, without their ever being guilty of theft; or false speaking or writing: to this they added, that if they departed a hair's breadth from this engagement, they should consider it tantamount to their having killed and eaten of a cow in the holy city; and that they should be considered as delinquents against the sircar. Protector of the world! Mahomed Dewan verbally communicated to us your majesty's commands, that we should not suffer ourselves to feel any apprehension in fulfilling this ceremony. Cherisher of the world! We can only feel apprehension and hesitation in not obeying the orders of the presence. What apprehension can we entertain in obedience and submission to commands, such only is the apprehension we felt in the present instance. The commands of the presence are imposed upon their servants, not upon others; princes and governors who entertain servants, do so for the purpose of experiencing from them obedience, and devotion to their interests; and if they exact from them the obligations and conditions of obedience, fidelity, and devotion, what harm is there in it? Others who every Sunday assemble in church, and, according to their laws and regulations, deliver precepts and admonitions, who entertain troops, and exercise them daily, do so with a view to the adjustment of their own concerns. If we also, with a view to the arrangement and adjustment of our concerns, take obligations and engagements from our servants, where is the objection? Please God, this measure, which your majesty has suggested, your having taken obligations and engagements from the servants in attendance upon your majesty, and your directing us to do the same here, is highly proper, expedient, and advisable.

and in sight of men of understanding, the good effects and benefits of it are endless and without bounds. The measure was necessary too; for what is the meaning that there should not be an union among the professors of the faith; that they should not devote themselves to the interests of their masters, and that, disregarding the claims of gratitude, they should turn their backs upon the enemy in the day of battle; these engagements and obligations are very proper, and involve many advantages; farther particulars will be made known to your majesty by the verbal representations of Mahomed Dewan, who attended, and was an eye-witness to all that passed. A list of the servants who are here present, and who entered into the engagements, is enclosed.

Good faith is the law for (or practice of) Syceeds. I complain of frequent neglects; let me be sometimes called to remembrance; at all events the intelligence of the marriage of the princes has rejoiced me. The presents usual on such occasions from my father will be sent, or (it may be interpreted) are now sent. Repeat the following couplet on my part to the nabob Tippoo Sultan. In the preservation of thy person is the perpetual permanence of the faith.

Let him not remain who wisheth not thy preservation.

Make my complaints to his highness of his not writing to me; if permission be required (for stating those complaints) you will obtain it. To the princes respect; to Kezza Ali Khan compliment. Gholaum Hussain.

No. 18. — Translation of a Letter from Mahomed Ghiyauss and Mahomed Ghosa Khan, Ambassadors from Tippoo Sultan to his Highness the Nabob of the Carnatic, dated 6th of Takree, of the Year Shaud 1223, A. N. Mahomed (17 Dec. 1795.)

The humblest of the servants of his majesty, the shadow of God, Tippoo Sultan, King, defender of the faith, may his dominion endure for ever! Mahommed Ghiyauss and Mahomed Ghose, after performing the ceremonies of obeisance, humbly represent to those who stand in the enlightened presence. Prior to this we had the honour to forward an address to your majesty from Ryaootah, whence we proceeded, and by regular stars, arrived on the 28th near Tirmulkerry. From that place we wrote a note to Khader Newaz Khan, which we dispatched by hircarras; a reply arrived, signifying that the nabob Omdut ul Omrah was much rejoiced at our approach, and desired that we would proceed with all possible expedition; adding, that an habitation was prepared for our reception; at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon we arrived there, and immediately a gentleman waited upon us, and told us he was come to perform the rights of hospitality. We answered, that it was perfectly conformable to his highness the nabob's known kindness and urbanity: he then caused firewood and earthen pots to be brought, and told us he had brought 100 rupees

for our immediate expences. We answered, that we were come on an occasion of condolence, what necessity was there for money? He was very importunate with us to accept it, but we made him carry it back. He returned with it however again, and again we sent him back with it. About 8 o'clock at night, Khader Newaz Khan himself came, and told us that the nabob was much displeased; however, if we would not accept the money he would send us dressed provisions. We replied, that, as we were his highness's guests, he might do so for a day, or two: after paying Khader Newaz Khan the compliment of the paun and ottur, we let him take leave. In the morning his highness sent us provisions from his own kitchen; this was continued for 3 days, and was continuing longer, but we sent word to Khader Newaz Khan, in the most earnest manner, that for 3 days it was very well, but if the practice was continued we should be under the necessity of sending the provisions back. Immediately on our arrival at Tirmulkerry, we sent our compliments by a choldar to the gov. who returned for answer, that he was happy to hear of our arrival. The next day an European, named Grant, who commands the governor's body guard, came to see us, and invited us to wait next day on the gov. who would conduct us to the nabob Omdut ul Omrah. We accordingly next day went to the governor's, to whom we delivered your majesty's letter, and the khelauf (or honorary dress). The gov. asked after your majesty's health, and we replied in suitable terms; after complimenting us with the paun and flowers and rose-water, he told us that he would introduce us early the next morning to the nabob. We then took leave and returned home, and sent notice to Khader Newaz Khan, that the gov. had postponed the intended visit of that day, but that we were desirous only of consulting his highness's pleasure, and should act as his highness might direct; he returned for answer, that it was no matter, we might come the day following. Early the next morning we went to the gov. and taking him with us we proceeded to the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, and delivered the khelauf of mourning and letter of condolence; his highness was very much pleased, and conversed about your majesty's health, and other subjects, a whole hour (23 minutes.). He then complimented us with the paun and ottur, and allowed us to depart; on our taking leave he took our hands, and observed to us with a great deal of anger, that we were his guests, and it was not proper for us to decline receiving provisions, conjuring us for God's sake not to send back the provisions which should be sent us while we remained here. We resisted as much as possible by argument, but his highness would not listen to our refusal, and again conjured us by oath not to return the provisions which should be sent to us while we remained; we could say no more and returned home. The next day his highness, having sent for Nussur ul Dowlah, appointed the next day for our again attending him, and we then delivered the khelauf and letters which were for him (Nussur ul Dowlah). He also made enquiries after your majesty's health, to which we made a suitable reply. His highness then gave us the ottur and paun, and suffered us to take leave. The day after we again went to the durbar, taking with us the letter and khelauf of congratulation, the jewels and horses.

We delivered the letter and khelaut, presented nuzzers of five rupees each, and sat down. His highness, with the greatest degree of kindness, placed us close to himself, and launched out into great praises of your majesty, and appeared delighted with the subject, telling us that it was his intention to send for us, and say what he had to say in private; adding, that our arrival at this time was extremely proper. His highness told us, that he had committed the late nabob Walajah's body to the earth, at the shrine of the saint named Muktdoom Sahib, at Mylapore, to be removed in 4 months. May the sun of prosperity always continue to shine. (A true translation.)

No. 19.—Translation of a Letter from Mahomed Ghyass and Mahomed Ghose Khan, deputed by Tippoo Sultan to the Nabob of the Carnatic, to the former (without Date.)

After dispatching our arzee, the nabob Omdut ul Omrah sent for us and spoke a good deal upon the subject of friendship between the two states; and then said to us, "You are both come on the part of my friend, and I do not design to part with you soon." We replied, that we certainly considered both states as one, but that at present some pressing business required our return, and therefore we must request him to give us leave to depart. Upon which he said, that please God he would soon do so; but, said his highness, it is not proper in you to send back the provisions, as you have repeatedly done so. I swear to God, that as long as you remain here, I shall send you provision, and you must also, for my particular satisfaction, wear clothes that I will provide you; you must not return them. We said in reply what appeared suitable to the occasion, but his highness would not listen to it, but renewed his adjuration, and giving us the otter and paun dismissed us. The next day, the 12th Takree, at 3 in the afternoon, Khadir Newaz Khan came with cloth and taylor, and told us it was his highness's command to him, to see the cloth cut out before us and fitted to us; we contested the point to the utmost with Khadir Newaz Khan, but he told us his highness had taken an oath, and that it was not proper in us to refuse. At length he caused four pieces of spotted muslin, and four pieces of [manuscript effaced] for each of us, to be cut out, and set the taylor to work, with injunctions to get the whole ready by the evening. From Sunday, during 5 or 6 days, the rains were incessant. On the 16th, when it ceased a little, Khadir Newaz Khan sent a message, that the rain had latterly prevented our receiving our dismissal, but now the khelauts for your majesty, the elephants and horses, &c. would be sent on that day, and that the following day his highness would send for us, and give us our dismissal. Accordingly, at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, an elephant and five horses, two khelauts of embroidery, and two pieces of jewellery, one a khulgu, and the other a surpaish, besides a large box sealed, in which were khelauts of spotted muslin, &c. and another box also sealed, containing the ottardawn and paundans, were brought by Daood Khan, and the keeper of the wardrope, &c. who desired us to take charge of these articles, and convey them safely to your majesty; that his highness had moreover sent two khelauts of embroidery for us, and that he would send for us the following day, and after having communicated to us that he had to say, would give us leave to depart. At their desire we took a memorandum of the articles. The next day we were prevented from waiting upon his highness by the violence of the rain. On the 3d day, at about 9 o'clock A.M. his highness sent word to us to come in the clothes which had been nearly made, as it would be a great gratification; to please him we accordingly did so. After many salaams, his highness, with the appearance of great satisfaction, arose, and taking our hands said, now am I extremely happy. We then sat in a private place, when his highness expatiated during 2 hours with great warmth upon the subject of union and friendship; after which he gave us the otter and paun, and suffered us to take leave and we returned home. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon we received a note from Khadir Newaz Khan, stating that his highness sent 2,000 rupees for our horses, and 300 rupees for the 3 duffadars, naik of Hircarrahs and duffadar (or head) of Khidmutgaes. We, in the presence of his highness's naik of Hircarrahs, made presents to his highness's servants out of that 2,000 rupees. We write this for your highness's information.

No. 20.—Translation of a Letter from the Nabob Omdut ul Omrah, to Gholaum Alli Khan.

After a lapse of time, and the moment my heart was desirous of learning accounts of your health, I had the pleasure to receive your friendly letter; and I was gratified by the news of your welfare. I have fully comprehended the several points contained in that letter; you will become acquainted with the circumstances alluded to from the communications of Mahomed Ghyass and Mahomed Ghose Khan. Deeming me desirous of receiving the pleasing accounts of your health, you will gratify me by communicating them. (Endorsement on the letter by one of Tippoo Sultan's monshees.)

No. 21.—Translation of a Letter, under the Seal of Khadir Newaz Khan, to Gholaum Alli Khan.

Deeming my desire of the honour of a meeting, which is replete with happiness, beyond the power of writing or speech to express, I proceed to represent the purpose of this address. Your kind letter, intimating that you had been indisposed after your leaving this place, but that your health was completely restored, has reached me, and its contents have been understood. Although I am concerned at the accounts of your indisposition, my thanks are offered up to Almighty God for your recovery. What you write of the satisfaction of the nabob Tippoo Sultan Behauder, may his shadow be extended! Upon the intimation of my attachment, has called forth my highest thanks and endless praises; and I beg you will present my respectful acknowledgments for his kindness and favours towards me. I have been from first to last endeavouring, that, through the favour of God; the degree of union between these two chosen of the Lord (meaning the nabob Omdut ul Omrah and Tippoo Sultaun) which is calculated to promote the happiness of God's people, may daily be strengthened and cemented; and mutual friendship and attachment be confirmed and established; and thanks to the Almighty, that the system of harmony and union has acquired the requisite degree of stability and firmness, (literally; that as it should be, so it is). Always believe me anxious for the news of your welfare, and constantly praying for your health and happiness.—(Endorsement on the letter by one of Tippoo Sultaun's moonshees.)

Extract from the Treaty concluded in 1787, between the English E. I. Company and the Nabob of the Carnatic.

Art. 15. Whenever the comp. shall enter into any negotiation wherein the interests of the Carnatic and its dependencies may be concerned, the president in council of Fort St. George shall communicate the proceedings to his highness the nabob of the Carnatic, as the firm ally of the comp.; and also the direction of the combined force of the country is committed entirely to the hon. comp. or their representatives. It is nevertheless understood, that his highness shall be informed of all measures which shall relate to the declaring of war, or making peace with any of the princes and powers of Hindostan; so far as the interests of the Carnatic may be immediately concerned; and the name of his highness shall be inserted in all treaties regarding the Carnatic; and his highness will not enter into any political negotiations or controversies with any state or power, without the consent or approbation of the president in council of Fort St. George.

Extract from the Treaty concluded in 1792, between the English E. I. Comp. and the Nabob of the Carnatic.

The said nabob shall receive regular information of all negotiations which shall relate to declaring war or making peace, wherein the said comp. may engage, and the interests of the Carnatic and its dependencies may be concerned; and the said nabob shall be considered as an ally of the said comp. in all treaties, which shall in any respect affect the Carnatic and countries depending thereon, or belonging to either of the contracting parties contiguous thereto; and the said nabob agrees that he will not enter into any negotiations or political correspondence with any European or native power; without the consent of the said comp.

No. 8. Copy of a Letter from the Govr Gen. to his late Highness the Nabob. [Written 28th May, 1801.]

Mem.—This letter is presented on a supposition that it is the same which is required by the 11th order of the hon. house, and therein described as having been shewn by Messrs. Webbe and Close to the Regents on the 15th July, 1801.

To the Nabob of Arcot.—For some time past your highness must have observed, that although I have received various communications from you with relation to the internal govt of the Carnatic, and to the general state of your affairs, I have not deemed it consistent with my public duty to return any reply to any other letters, which I have had the honour to receive from your highness, excepting those containing the usual interchange of compliments between your highness and the Brit. govt; the cause of my silence is of the most serious nature, and has occasioned the deepest and most sincere regret to my mind. The success of our arms against the late Tippoo Sultaun has brought to light many important and extraordinary transactions. My determination on the subject of the proofs which I possess has been formed after the fullest deliberation; and after the most dispassionate review of all the circumstances of the case, I have communicated my final opinion to Id Clive, with my positive directions to carry into effect, without delay, those arrangements which the nature of the case appears to me to require, for the security of the Brit. interests in the Carnatic. Id Clive will enter into a full explanation of all the evidence which has been discovered at Seringapatam, and will also state to your highness the purport of the instructions which he has received from me. I request your highness to consider Id Clive to be fully authorized by me to terminate the requisite arrangements, and under this view of the question, I trust that you will not expect from me any interruption to the course of those measures which I have judged to be indispensably necessary, and which I have directed Id Clive to accomplish without further reference to my authority.

No. 9. Copy of Proceedings of the Govr in Council of Fort St. George, on the signing of the Treaty between the Company and Assem ul Doulah.

To his Excellency the most noble the Marq. Wellesley, K. P. Govr Gen. in Council at Fort Willam.—My lord, Id Clive has had the honour of informing the govt gen. of the demise of his highness the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, the late nabob of the Carnatic, on the 15th inst. His excellency has also been apprised by his ldp of the measures adopted by Id Clive, in conformity to the separate dispatches of the govt. gen. for establishing the rights and interests of the Brit. govt in the Carnatic, on the permanent basis of territorial security.—2. Those dispatches, and the result of Id Clive's measures for the arrangement of the affairs of the Carnatic, having been communicated to us, we have the honour to acquaint your excellency in council, that a treaty has been this day concluded, subject to the ratification of the govt gen. in council, for settling the succession to the soubeharry of the territories of Arcot, and for vesting the entire civ. and mil. govt of the Carnatic in the hands of the comp.—3. The separate dispatches of Id Clive will have explained to his excellency the govt gen. the cause which prevented his ldp from communicating to the late nabob Omdut ul Omrah, the nature of the govt gen.'s instructions, founded on the written and oral testimony taken at Seringapatam; the subsequent demand made by Id Clive of an adequate security for the Brit. interests in the Carnatic, from the reputed son of Omdut ul Omrah; the positive and formal rejection by that person of an amicable adjustment of the affairs of the Carnatic, founded on the rights acquired by the comp. from his reputed father's violation of the alliance, and of the express stipulations of the treaty of 1792; the subsequent motives of Id Clive for opening a negotiation with the prince Azeem ul Dowlet Behauder, for the purpose of reviving the alliance between the family of his highness and the Brit. govt, founded on the instructions of the gov. gen. to avoid the humiliation of the family of the nabob Mahomed Ali, if it should be practicable to obtain by negotiation the security required for our rights in the Carnatic, and finally the terms of the arrangement, which has been concluded by the deputies under the immediate authority of Id Clive: these points having been fully stated in his ldp's separate dispatches, we trust that it will be sufficient for us to refer the gov. gen. in council to those dispatches, with the expression of our entire concurrence in the arrangements adopted by Id Clive under his excellency's separate instructions.—4. We have now the honour of transmitting to your excellency in council, an official copy of the treaty, which has this day been executed, and interchanged by us, with the nabob Azeem ul Dowlet Behauder; and we recommended that a ratified copy of the treaty may be transmitted to us with all practicable expedition, for the purpose of being delivered to his highness.—5. The change of circumstances arising from the conduct of Ali Hussein, and the persons appointed to assist his counsels, has rendered it necessary for Id Clive to introduce a correspondent change in the structure of the declaration transmitted to his ldp by the gov. gen. We have the honour of transmitting to your excellency in council, a copy of the declaration, in the form in which we should judge it advisable to publish that paper, if your excellency should deem the publication of it to be expedient.—6. It is our intention that a copy of the declaration in this form shall be immediately transmitted to the gov. in council at Bombay, and to the residents at Hyderabad and Poona, for the purpose of communicating to them the grounds on which the succession of the soubhaddary of the territories of Arcot, and the arrangement of the affairs of the Carnatic, have been settled and established; but we shall use no further means for the distribution of that document, unless we should receive instructions for that purpose from your excellency in council.—7. In concluding an arrangement involving consequences of so much importance to the Brit. interests in India, it is impossible for us not to feel a degree of anxiety correspondent to the magnitude of the subject, until we shall be honoured by the receipt of the determination of your excellency in council on this transaction. In the mean while, anticipating with confidence the concurrence of your ldp's sentiments with our own, we offer our congratulations to your excellency in council on the conclusion of an arrangement, by which the rights and interests of Gt Brit. in the Carnatic have at length been fixed on the solid foundation of territorial security.—8. We have the honour to inform your excellency in council, that his highness the nabob

Azeem ul Dowlet Behauder has this day been installed in the musnud of his ancestors, as nabob soubhaddar of the Carnatic, with every mark of public respect from the Brit. govt, and with every practicable degree of splendour conformable to the usages of India.—9. It is our intention to dispatch the Whim packet immediately for the purpose of conveying to the hon. the secret committee of the court of directors our dispatches on the subject, which is now submitted to the gov. gen. in council.—We have the honour to be, &c. &c.

[As Nos. 10 and 11 are in substance a repetition of the foregoing papers, we think it unnecessary to give them.]

No. 12. Copy of Orders published to the Settlement of Fort St. George, dated 31st July, 1801, relative to the Treaty between the Comp. and Azeem ul Dowlah.

Proclamation.—1. Whereas the object of the connexion subsisting between the hon. comp. and their highnesses, heretofore nabobs of the Carnatic, was intended to cement the union and alliance between the contracting parties, and to establish, on a solid foundation, the security and rights of the said contracting parties in the territories of the Carnatic: And whereas the several engagements concluded for that purpose have failed to answer the intention of the contracting parties, whereby the form of govt throughout the provinces of the Carnatic has been subjected to changes injurious to established opinions, to general confidence, and to permanent prosperity: And whereas the musnud of the soubhaddary of the territories of Arcot having become vacant, his highness the nabob Walajah Ameer ul Omrah, Madar ul Mulk, Ameer ul Hind, Azeem ul Dowlah, Shewkul Jung Sepah, Salar Anwerodeen Khan Behauder, has succeeded by the hereditary rights of his father, and by the full acknowledgments of the hon. comp. to the possession of the said musnud: Wherefore his said highness the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder, and the said comp. being desirous of correcting such errors as have been heretofore introduced into the govt of the Carnatic, and of supplying the defects of all former engagements between the said contracting parties; and being also anxious to give full vigour and efficiency to the govt of the Carnatic, with a view to fix the rights of the people, and the interests of the state, on a broad and stable foundation, have mutually, and of their own accord, agreed, by a treaty bearing date the 31st July, 1801, that all former provisions for securing a partial or temporary interference on the part of the hon. comp. in the govt, or in the administration of the revenues of the Carnatic, shall be entirely annulled; and that in lieu thereof a permanent system for the collection of the revenue, and for the administration of civil and criminal judicature, under the sole and undivided authority of the hon. comp. shall be established throughout every village, pargunnah, and province, of the entire territories of the Carnatic.—2. Now proclamation is hereby accordingly made, to all zemindars, jaggeerdars, talookdars, polygars, cavilgars, and inhabitants of every description of the Carnatic, that the hon. comp. have, by the treaty above mentioned, acquired a perfect right to ascertain, determine, and establish rights of property, to fix a reasonable assessment upon the several pargunnahs and villages of the Carnatic, and to secure a fixed and permanent revenue, to be collected and accounted for, by such officers as shall from time to time be appointed for that purpose by the said comp. And it is further published and declared, that the said comp. have also acquired a perfect right to establish courts for the due administration of civ. and crim. judicature, under the sole authority of the said comp. which said courts shall be conducted by officers to be appointed from time to time by the said comp. under such ordinances and regulations as shall from time to time be enacted and published by the govr in council of Fort St. George.—3. And whereas his said highness the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder has divested himself, by the treaty above mentioned, of all controul, authority, or interference in the collection of the revenue, or in the administration of civ. and crim. judicature: Wherefore all zemindars, jaggeerdars, talookdars, polygars, cavilgars, and inhabitants, of the Carnatic, are hereby required to take notice of the same accordingly. And it is hereby farther proclaimed and declared, that the engagement now entered into between the contracting parties for the purposes above mentioned, are unconditional, and liable to no change whatever. Therefore the said zemindars, jaggeerdars, talookdars, polygars, cavilgars, and inhabitants of the Carnatic, are hereby required to take notice, that the right and power of fixing and collecting the revenue, as well as of administering civ. and crim. judicature throughout the provinces, pargunnahs, and villages of the Carnatic, are vested in the said comp. alone, as long as the sun and moon shall endure.—4. Wherefore all zemindars, jaggeerdars, talookdars, polygars, cavilgars, officers, and inhabitants of the Carnatic, are severally and collectively required; by virtue of the rights and powers acquired to the said comp. by compact with the present lawful nabob of the Carnatic, his highness the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder, to yield due obedience to such officers as may be appointed; and to such ordinances or laws as may be enacted by the said comp. alone, for the administration and govt of the territories of the Carnatic, and in all time to come.—5. Although the rt hon. the govr in council trusts that the experience which the inhabitants of the Carnatic have already had, will have rendered it unnecessary for his ldp to explain the general principles of moderation, justice, protection, and security, which form the characteristic features of the Brit govt; yet his ldp, in accepting the sacred trust transferred to the comp. by the present engagements, invites the people of the Carnatic to a ready and cheerful obedience to the authority of the comp. in a confident assurance of enjoying, under the protection of public and defined laws, every just and ascertained civil right, with a free exercise of the religious institutions and domestic usages of their ancestors.—By order of the rt hon. the govr in council. J. WEBBE, Chief Sec. to Govt. Fort St. George, 31st July, 1801.

No. 13. Information submitted to the Hon. House of Commons, in obedience to several Orders dated 11th June, 1802, stating Reasons why the same have not been fully complied with.

The papers required by the 3d order, are presumed to be contained in the documents numbered 1 and 2. The paper required by the 4th order, is contained in paper No. 4; and that required by the 5th order in the same document. The attestation of the Mahomedan lawyers, and of the families of the nabobs Mahomed Alli and Omdut ul Omrah, required by the 6th order, have not been transmitted to the court of directors by the govt of Fort St. George; nor has the correspondence required by the 8th order, or the proceedings and minutes required by the 13th order, or the separate minutes required by the 15th, or the proceedings required by the 16th, been yet received. The comp. have not any record in England of the will of the late nabob Omdut ul Omrah, required by the 20th order.

No. 14. Copy of the Affidavit of the Physician of the late Nabob of Arcot, on the State of his Highness's Health; dated 22d June, 1801.

Maurice Fitzgerald, esq. physician to his highness the nabob of the Carnatic, having been apprised by the rt hon. Ed. Id Clive, govr in council of Fort St. George, of his ldp's desire to communicate to the nabob of the Carnatic the arrival of a dispatch from the govr gen. in council, involving considerations of great importance relative to the affairs of the Carnatic, and of the govt of Fort St. George; and the said Mr. Fitzgerald being farther informed, that it is the intention of Id Clive to solicit the nabob's appointment of an early period of time for the consideration of the object of that dispatch; unless the medical gentlemen attending his highness's person should be of opinion that such a communication would be attended with consequences injurious to the state of his highness's health: declares upon oath, that although from the actual state of his highness's illness, he the said Mr. Fitzgerald cannot take upon himself to swear, that the communication of Id Clive's intentions above described would produce effects immediately dangerous to the existence of the nabob; yet, as a professional man, he can have no doubt, and accordingly declares on oath, his belief that the knowledge of the arrival of dispatches from the govr gen. seriously affecting the interests of the Carnatic, would tend to aggravate and inflame the dangerous symptoms which now threaten his highness's life.

No. 15.—Extracts from the Examination of certain Persons, taken before Messrs. Webb and Close, at Vellore and Seringapatam, in May 1800, by Order of Marq. Wellesley. Vellore, 3d May 1800.

Ally Rezza having been required by Lt Col. Doveton to attend the commissioners, is accordingly introduced; and is informed of the orders of the rt hon. the govr in council, and of his ldp's authority committed to the commissioners, for the purpose of conducting an enquiry into certain transactions of great importance, connected with the interests of the hon. comp.—Previously to the commencement of his examination, the following introductory explanation having been translated into the Persian language, is read, and explained to Ally Rezza.—“The consideration which the English comp. has shewn to the family of Tippoo Sultaun, and to the dependants of his govt, must have manifested to all descriptions of persons the liberality and moderation by which it has been always guided; and it must be equally evident, that having consulted the claims of humanity, as well as the dignity of its own character, in this distinguished manner, the English govt would meet with the utmost degree of regret and concern, any necessity which should compel it to modify the arrangements which have been made for the comfort and happiness of the dependants of the late Tippoo Sultaun.—It is however not inconsistent with this magnanimity, that the Brit. govt should exact from those who have accepted its bounty, the duties of attachment and truth, in all matters connected with its interests; and it requires no explanation to shew, that as the Brit. govt has the generosity to forgive, so, if necessary, it possesses the power to punish those who may wilfully depart from the duties which they owe to it. It is known to you, that after the fall of Seringapatam the whole of the records and papers, public, secret, and confidential, of the govt of Tippoo Sultaun, fell into the hands of the conquerors; and, considering the causes which produce the necessity of the late war, it will be obvious to you, that the Eng. govt has been inquisitive to discover the arrangements and councils, by which it was the intention of the late sultaun to have effected his purposes of enmity against us.—This enquiry has naturally led to the discovery of much important matter, and many original documents, plain as well as in cypher, relative to the measures and intentions of the late sultaun. Some of these measures require the explanation, which it is known to be in your power to give: The Eng. govt has therefore appointed us to be commissioners for receiving this information; and it will be your duty, as well as your very near interest, reflecting on what is already stated, to give a faithful and just explanation.—From the treatment which you have already experienced, it will be evident to you that the Brit. govt places too just a value on the observance of fidelity, to impute to the servants of the late sultaun any blame for being the channel of executing his orders or measures. According to the established practice of the law of nations; according to the principles of justice and reason, servants are not held to be responsible for executing the orders of their sovereigns, as far as they may be consistent with the public law, by which the intercourse between independent states is regulated; you may therefore rely on a liberal construction of your conduct by the Brit. govt; and it is not the intention of that govt to deprive you of any of the works of the public bounty which you now enjoy, unless by prevarication, or any treacherous attempt to conceal the truth, you should render yourself unworthy of the continuance of its favour.—From the manner in which this enquiry has originated, as well as from the means adopted for carrying it into effect, you will perceive that it is matter full of importance, and gravity; it will therefore be expedient for you to deliver your sentiments and explanations, with the degree of consideration and respect which is becoming the occasion.”—Ally Rezza acknowledged that he comprehends and feels the force and meaning of the foregoing exhortation, and having himself perused it in the Persian language, professes his entire readiness and desire to answer all questions, and to give all information which may be required, to the best of his power and knowledge.

The Commissioners proceed to the examination of Ally Rezza.

The papers marked [Nos. 14 and 15,] in the correspondence transmitted from Bengal, having been produced and read to the witness, are immediately recognized by him.—Q. What did Omdut ul Omrah communicate to you in the secret meeting which you held with him in the garden, subsequent to the 23d July 1795?—A. Omdut ul Omrah informed the vakeels, of the probable rupture between the French and the English, and of the consequent attack on Pondicherry; he stated, that Tippoo Sultaun had a vakeel, Ram Row, at that place; that the keeping a vakeel at that time might give offence; and that therefore the nabob Walajah, from his attachment to the faith, made this communication to prevent any indisposition between Tippoo Sultaun and the comp; that these sentiments were communicated from a regard to the welfare of Tippoo Sultaun.—He recommended, that after the departure of the hostages, the sultaun should appoint an ambassador at Madras, which would be attended with the best consequences, and stated that this was not communicated from any partiality to the Eng. but from good wishes towards Tippoo Sultaun.—Q. What were the particular expressions of his attachment to Tippoo Sultaun, which Omdut ul Omrah required you not to commit to writing, but to defer the communication of them until your return to the presence of your master?—A. Having repeated the substance of his answer to the preceding question, Ally Rezza was about to explain the expression of the “Affair known,” which is mentioned in the last paragraph of papers [Nos. 14 and 15,] but was interrupted.—Q. What answer did Tippoo Sultaun return to the said communication from Omdut ul Omrah, and through what channel was that answer transmitted?—A. The sultaun replied, that the vakeels were persons of ability and information, and would conduct their affairs for the benefit of the sircar. The vakeels communicated the message after their arrival in the presence; that no immediate observation was made upon it; that nine days after they fell under the displeasure of the sultaun, and that the intercourse between them and the sultaun was in consequence discontinued. The only subsequent communication was on the subject of a letter from Bengal, relative to the release of the English prisoners, and to the war between England and France. Tippoo Sultaun, notwithstanding the contents, fully directed him, Ally Rezza, to prepare an answer, and send it to the presence that it might be dispatched.—Q. Did Tippoo Sultaun return any answer to the letters, Nos. 14 and 15?—A. Yes. He directed us to enquire into the particulars of the affair, to represent them after our arrival, when he would act according to propriety.—Q. Have you any recollection of receiving from Tippoo Sultaun, a letter directing you to commit, to writing, and to transmit to the presence, the communications of Omdut ul Omrah?—A. No. He wrote nothing more than the above.—He, Ally Rezza, says, that at the departure of the vakeels, Omdut ul Omrah made three obeissances; and directed them to assure the sultaun of his, Omdut ul Omrah's regard, and to advise him not to break with the English; that he should not consider this communication to be a deviation from the principles of their religion, but that the true Islam consisted in preserving unity with the English.

[The paper, No. 13, is produced.] Q. Do you recollect this letter?—A. Yes; and he wrote besides to the above effect.—Q. State the nature and object of the agreement, which was established through you, between the nabob Wallajah and Tippoo Sultaun?—A. At the time of the departure of Id Cornwallis, his ldp desired me to proceed to Seringapatam, and to communicate to the sultaun much matter of advice, containing observations on the state of hostility, which had been protracted for a long time, from the early descent of Hyder Ally into the Carnatic, and the action of col. Baillie: That Id Cornwallis wished the sultaun to preserve the relations of peace and friendship; and desired that Ally Rezza should proceed from Madras to Seringapatam, to represent verbally and fully the subject of this discourse. That at the same time the nabob Wallajah also made similar observations, with professions of his friendly disposition towards the sultaun. On his arrival at Seringapatam, he, Ally Rezza represented the whole of this discourse, and, according to the orders of the sultaun, committed it to writing, which was delivered to him, the sultaun: That Tippoo Sultaun wrote an answer to Id Cornwallis, professing his disposition and wish to preserve peace and friendship; that the letter was very full on this point, and was accompanied by presents to Id Cornwallis, govr Oakeley, Mr. Cherry, &c. He, Tippoo Sultaun, also sent letters to the nabob Wallajah certainly; but the witness does not recollect whether any were sent to Omdut ul Omrah.—Q. In the preceding question, you were desired to explain the nature of the agreement established between Tippoo Sultaun and the nabob Wallajah; in your answer you have not done so?—A. The agreement was to preserve the friendship established between the two durbars, the English and Tippoo Sultaun, as well as the intercourse of civility and attention. Besides this the nabob Wallajah, at the time of taking leave, presented khelats, &c.; and Omdut ul Omrah delivered a khelat into the hands of sir Chs Oakeley, to be given to the vakeels of the sultaun; which was accordingly done. Omdut ul Omrah told them that it recommended the preservation of friendship, peace, and attention. A copy of this letter was delivered to the vakeels, which they opened at Conditoor, [two stages from Madras,] and were surprised to find, that it contained nothing more than the ordinary expressions of friendship, and a list of the presents. The letter was delivered to the sultaun. The nabob informed the vakeels, that it was his highness's wish to grant a jagheer for the private expenses of the princes, as well as of the vakeels. They replied, that it was contrary to the customs of their govt to receive those jagheers; but that they should represent this wish of his highness, on their arrival at Seringapatam.—Q. Did you, according to the sultaun's orders, commit to writing the matter of a secret nature, which was communicated to you by Omdut ul Omrah?—A. I complied with the orders in the sultaun's letter.—Q. In what manner?—A. By writing to the sultaun the particulars of the professions of regard, which had been communicated by Omdut ul Omrah.—Having again referred to Nos. 14 and 15, and 13, the witness is asked what answer he gave the sultaun?—A. That he had been enjoined at his departure to postpone the communication until his arrival at Seringapatam, and that he would accordingly represent it in the presence.—Q. Why did Omdut ul Omrah defer this communication till your departure? And why did he exact an oath of secrecy on the communication of this regard and friendship for the sultaun?—A. Perhaps from apprehensions that this intercourse should be known, and give displeasure to the English.—Q. Did he exact a formal oath?—A. No; he conjured us.—Q. It appears that the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah stated, in the presence of Eng. gents, their regard and friendship for Tippoo Sultaun: Why should they be so anxious to conceal it in the private meeting?—A. He repeats the same answer, and can give no other explanation. The paper [No. 14,] is again produced and read.—Q. Reconcile the formality of the proceeding described at the mosque, with the mere professions of friendship? A. He acknowledges that the formality may be considered preparatory to more important matter; but nothing passed except professions of regard, the propriety of keeping up a friendly intercourse, and an offer of settling some munshon themselves, which they declined in a suitable manner. Q. During your residence at Madras, did you understand that there was any restraint on the intercourse of the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah with the hostages, or with the vakeels? A. There was no restraint, they had but four or five meetings, which were with maj. Doveton's previous knowledge. Q. Did maj. Doveton know of the meeting at the mosque? A. No; the vakeels told him that they were going to the mosque for the fatihah. In regard to the meeting at the garden, they informed him that they were going to arrange their effects for the journey. Q. As Omdut ul Omrah had nothing to communicate but professions of friendship, why did the vakeels depart from their established custom by concealing from maj. Doveton the intended meeting at the garden? A. As the nabob Omdut ul Omrah intimated a wish of seeing them privately, they thought that the presence of maj. Doveton would be embarrassing to his highness. At my departure from Seringapatam on my return to Madras, Tippoo Sultaun communicated to me his desire of forming a connexion by marriage between his own family and that of the nabob Wallajah. This message I delivered by the sultaun's orders to Ghulam Ally Khan; and on our meeting at the garden a second time I withdrew; a conversation took place between Omdut ul Omrah and Ghulam Ally Khan. From him I afterwards understood that the agitation of the affair was suspended; until the entire completion of the treaty of Seringapatam, and the release of the hostages, in order that the disposition of the sultaun might be well ascertained at the distance of some time; that in the mean while there was neither a positive desire nor indisposition expressed by the nabob Wallajah for this connexion. The proposal was first made from the sultaun; and as it passed in the lifetime of the nabob Wallajah, I conclude that the answer of Omdut ul Omrah was with his knowledge. After the return of the vakeels to Seringapatam, they fell under the displeasure of the sultaun; and I understood that Gholam Ally Sudder and Poornah were deputed to Gholam Ally Khan, to ascertain what progress had been made in the affair of the connexion, wishing at the same time that Gholam Ally Khan should give a letter on that subject to Omdut ul Omrah. This letter he supposes to have been granted, but does not know. Q. Did any orders pass from the sultaun on the subject of the marriage before your return to Seringapatam from Madras? A. No. This question was not agitated before. On my arrival at Seringapatam, Tippoo Sultaun enquired of me the particulars relative to the children of Wallajah. Ally Rezza, of himself states, that the nabob Wallajah communicated in the most earnest manner, taking God to witness, his entreaty to the sultaun, that he should refrain from breaking with the Eng. and that he should adhere to the friendship established between them. Q. The proposal of marriage having been made in the first instance on the part of the sultaun, it was certainly evidence of his wish to cultivate a good understanding with the nabob Wallajah's family. It is extraordinary therefore that the nabob Omdut ul Omrah on making a simple proposition of friendship, should doubt the sultaun's acquiescence, and should on that doubt postpone the final communication of his sentiments until the answer of the sultaun should be received? A. He, Ally Rezza, acknowledges that the proposition for the marriage was an indication of entire and cordial friendship. But although he understood from Gholam Ally Khan, that the nabob Wallajah was disposed to this connexion, he yet learned from others, that the case was different; he therefore conjectures that the nabob shewed a desire of simple friendship, without reference to the marriage. Q. When the nabob Wallajah made his proposition of simple friendship requiring an answer, how did it happen that the vakeels, who were in possession of the sultaun's orders to effect a much more intimate connexion, did not satisfy the nabob Omdut ul Omrah of the disposition of the sultaun, without farther reference to Seringapatam? A. A proposition of marriage being of a very delicate nature among Mussulmans, and confined in this instance to Gholam Ally Khan only, it was not proper for both vakeels to interfere on this subject; the conversation was entirely confined between Omdut ul Omrah and Gholam Ally Khan at the garden; when they took leave at parting, Ally Rezza states of himself, that after the vakeels had arrived at the mount, on their final return to Seringapatam, Omdut ul Omrah came to the mount, and had a separate conversation with Gholam Ally Khan, which he supposes to have related to the proposition of the marriage. Q. Were you, or were you not, on terms of confidential communication with Gholam Ally Khan, relative to the progress of this affair of the marriage? A. I was; and heard from Gholam Ally Khan, that the nabob Wallajah had consented, although I understood from other quarters that this was not the case. Q. Both vakeels being (as is stated in your answer) in confidential communication relative to the point of the marriage; how did it happen that they did not take on themselves to satisfy the doubts expressed by the nabob Wallajah, in order to promote the wishes of the sultaun; there being no impediment to a proper communication either between the vakeels themselves, or between Gholam Ally Khan and Omdut ul Omrah? A. Having observed the doubts of the nabob with respect to the disposition of the sultaun, I took occasion to suggest to Gholam Ally Khan, at the time of the meeting at the tomb, the expediency of satisfying the doubts of Omdut ul Omrah, by pointing out the positive proof of the sultaun's disposition evinced in his proposal of marriage. I then retired with Kadir Nawas Khan, and understood from Gholam Ally Khan, after the nabob Omdut ul Omrah went away, that he, Gholam Ally Khan, had made a communication to his highness to that effect, and that his highness had acquiesced. The witness repeats that he had heard from others, that the nabob Wallajah was averse to this connexion. Q. As the nabob Omdut ul Omrah acquiesced in the arguments of Gholam Ally Khan, why did it become necessary to apply for a further declaration of the sultaun's disposition, on the proposition of simple friendship? A. I conceive that there are two different questions, one of the marriage, the other of simple friendship, and the vakeels thought it necessary to address the sultaun on that point. Q. In the paper (No. 14,) the nabob Omdut ul Omrah is stated to communicate his wish of discovering a matter of secrecy, and accordingly a secret meeting was contrived for that purpose. By your foregoing answers, the result of this proposition is nothing more than a simple proposition of friendship, connected with a doubt of its being received by the nabob Tippoo Sultaun. At the very same time that this doubt is stated, the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, is said to have been reminded of the proof of the sultaun's disposition, contained in his proposal of marriage, and (according to Gholam Ally Khan) to have acquiesced in the arguments. It is extraordinary that Omdut ul Omrah should require so much secrecy in declaring his wish of cultivating the friendship of Tippoo Sultaun; and it is inconsistent with reason that he should doubt this proof of the sultaun's disposition at the moment of his endeavouring to discover it. This explanation of Omdut ul Omrah's proposition cannot be therefore reconciled with the explanation which has been given; for as the respective propositions of marriage, and of simple friendship, did not depend on each other, either the doubt of Omdut ul Omrah must have been without foundation, or the necessity of farther reference to the sultaun under the appearance of secrecy, must refer to other matter?

Mem.—The foregoing question is explained and stated in every point of view to Ally Rezza, with a serious warning to consider it, and to declare the truth.

A. He acknowledges the inconsistency, but takes God to witness in the most solemn manner, that nothing passed at the mosque with his knowledge, save the communication between Omdut ul Omrah and Gholam Ally Khan, on the subject of the marriage, the declaration of Omdut ul Omrah's desire of cultivating Tippoo Sultaun's friendship, and his offer for establishing jagheers and munsuhs for the princes and the vakeels. Q. You have stated, that on pursuing the copy of the letter delivered to you through the means of sir C. Oakeley, you were surprized to find that it contained nothing but expressions of civility, and a list of presents. What did you expect the letter to contain? A. I expected that the letter would relate to the proposition of marriage, or friendship, or to the jagheers or munsuhs. Q. What do you mean by the expression in No. 14, "to redeem the time past?" A. That the injuries of enmity should be replaced by the benefits of friendship.—The letter in figure cypher is now produced, and Ally Rezza acknowledges it to have been written by him. Q. Was any other cypher used in the correspondence with Tippoo Sultaun? A. I do not recollect any other. Q. When was the cypher delivered to you? A. When I was returning from Seringapatam to Madras. Q. For what purpose was it given to you? A. For the purpose of writing intelligence and other matters of a secret nature.—The witness states, that he once received a letter in cypher in Tippoo's own hand-writing, which could not be explained, and was referred back to him. He also states, that the sultaun was at the time extremely interested in the state of French affairs; and was desirous of obtaining information respecting them by every possible means; and he told the vakeels so, upbraiding them for not having transmitted intelligence. Q. Explain the affair referred to in the last paragraph of No. 15; and state how Omdut ul Omrah became the means of laying the foundation of it? A. It refers to the proposition of marriage; and Ally Rezza explains, that it was the wish of Tippoo Sultaun to obtain a daughter either of Wallajah, or of Omdut ul Omrah, for sultaun Moven ul Deen. The affair was communicated to Omdut ul Omrah, and he was made the father instrument of communication to the nabob Wallajah. Ally Rezza states of his own accord, during this part of the examination, that he took occasion of stating to gen. Harris (he believes through capt. Macleod) at Seringapatam, the anxiety which had been expressed by Id Cornwallis, the nabob Wallajah, and Omdut ul Omrah, that Tippoo should refrain from the infraction of the treaty, and should be induced to preserve friendship and cordiality with the English, as the only means by which the fortunes of his house could be supported; and that he, Ally Rezza, had explained these sentiments to Tippoo Sultaun in vain.

The paper [No. 16] is produced and read.—

Q. Was Omdut ul Omrah present at the ceremony described in this letter? A. No; the younger sons of Wallajah were present. Q. What was the object of this ceremony? A. He explains; it was a practice of Tippoo Sultaun's to administer oaths to his servants, dependants, and officers of his government, on the points stated in the paper, and that the order was received by the vakeels for swearing those at Madras, which was accordingly done in the manner described. Q. Was it not to engage the congregation present to assist the Khodadad Sirkar, and to throw off their allegiance to the Brit. govt.? A. The oaths were administered only to the servants of the Khodadad Sirkar. The discourse was addressed to all the Mussulmans present; and it is obvious, from the letter itself, that the intention was to attach the Mussulmans to Tippoo Sultaun, and to reprove them for adhering to those of a different persuasion. He, Ally Rezza, adds, that he divests himself of all difficulty in making this confession, since it is the object of the present enquiry to obtain the truth. Q. Did the nabob's sons, who were present, join in the prayer, that the Khodadad Sirkar might be triumphant and victorious? A. The prayer for victory and triumph refers entirely to the servants of the Khodadad Sirkar. Q. Why did Tippoo Sultaun imagine that you might feel apprehensive in fulfilling his orders respecting this ceremony? A. Because the ceremony was to be performed in the territories of a foreign power, and because the nature of the oath administered to the servants was adverse to those of a different persuasion. Q. Was the obligation and engagement taken on that day in the mosques from the servants of Tippoo Sultaun only; or was it a general union among those professing the Mahomedan faith at Madras? A. No person but the servants of the Khodadad Sirkar received the oath. Q. When did you leave Madras for Seringapatam? A. On the 22d Jaffer 1209 Hagry. (A mistake, this answers to Sept. 1794.) Q. How often did you go to Seringapatam? A. Once during the residence of the princes at Madras. Q. When did you return to Madras? A. I was absent nearly three months, and returned about the 18 or 19 of Jemradul Ovol.

The paper, No. 7, is produced.—Q. Who was meant by the term well-wisher of mankind? A. The nabob Wallajah. Q. Why was he distinguished by that name? A. In consequence of a desire expressed by the nabob Wallajah to be distinguished by that epithet, in order to shew that he was not confined to any party, but well-disposed to all mankind. Q. What are the points which could not be committed to paper, and could only be communicated in person? A. To recapitulate, according to Id Cornwallis's directions, the course of hostile transaction which had taken place from early times between the two states; to insist on the detention of the prisoners by Tippoo Sultaun, and his cruelty towards them; to inculcate the necessity of a reform in his sentiments towards the British nation, and to lay the foundation of permanent friendship, to be farther confirmed in Europe.—These propositions of Id Cornwallis were confirmed by the advice of the nabob Wallajah, founded on his long experience and age. Q. What sirdars are meant in the passage "At this time the friendship and goodwill of both the sirdars is from God and the royal anspects?" A. Lord Cornwallis and the nabob Wallajah. Q. Why could not these points be committed to writing at Madras, since they were committed to writing after your arrival at Seringapatam? A. The time of paying the kists had passed; and the prisoners were still detained; it was with the intention therefore of using my personal influence with the sultaun in these points, since all writing had proved vain.—Ally Rezza states from himself, that about this time he had received a letter from Tippoo Sultaun, mentioning that no prisoners remained in his dominions; that this communication was in consequence made to the Brit. govt, but that in one month three prisoners made their escape and arrived. Q. Where were you in the months of Mehurreeon and Suffer 1209?

A. In Seringapatam. Q. Were you at that time in the habit of attending the durbar of Tippoo Sultaun? A. It was stopped. No. Q. Were you in the habit of corresponding with the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah, after your final return to Seringapatam? A. No; there was intercourse between these nabobs and Tippoo Sultaun by means of letters, and of Mahomed Ghyaus and Mahomed Ghaus Khan. Q. Were any other persons employed besides those two persons as vakeels at Madras? A. I was under confinement; but believe not. Q. Did you at any time receive letters from the nabobs Wallajah or Omdut ul Omrah, after your departure to Seringapatam? A. None. Q. Did you receive any verbal messages? A. None; I was confined. Q. Do you know whether the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah used any cypher in writing to Tippoo Sultaun? A. I do not; I only recollect two letters from the nabob Wallajah, and one to him from Tippoo Sultaun.—[The paper, No. 6, is produced.]—Q. Did you ever see this paper? A. I have; it was instituted by Wallajah for purposes of secret communication, and the original I believe was written in pencil by Kadir Nawas Khan, or some person about the nabob Wallajah.—Q. You stated that you knew but of one cypher, and you acknowledge to have seen this 2nd cypher now produced? A. It is very true; but altho' this paper was intended for purposes of secret communication, it was of a different description from what I meant by the cypher. To my knowledge this paper was not brought into use, it having been intended for use after the departure of the hostages, in case of necessity. Q. Did you carry this paper with you to Seringapatam, when you went with Id Cornwallis's propositions? A. Yes, I d.d. Q. From whom did you receive it; and to whom d.d. you deliver it after your arrival at Seringapatam? A. It was delivered to Gholam Ally Khan by Kadir Nawas Khan, and to me, at my departure, by Gholam Ally Khan, who told me that it had been composed for communication between Tippoo Sultaun and the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah; that a copy should be given to Tippoo, and the original brought back to Madras. Tippoo Sultaun however kept the original paper. Q. It appears that pains were taken to procure private meetings with the vakeels at Madras by Omdut ul Omrah, and it appears that two cyphers were established for the purpose of secret communications. It is therefore very extraordinary, that so much trouble should have been taken to conceal matters, which, if accomplished or known, must have tended to increase the friendship between Tippoo and the Brit. nation? A. I acknowledge another inconsistency between the means used and the purposes already stated, and that such an inconsistency does afford ground for suspicion. With respect to the second paper, I do not know of its having been brought into use; and I call God to witness, that I am ready to meet any extremity which the English govt may choose to inflict, if any point was agitated with my knowledge besides those already stated. Ally Rezza adds by way of explanation, that the real cypher (in figures) was intended for communication of intelligence between the vakeels and Tippoo Sultaun, and not to be used between the two durbars. He, Ally Rezza, once took occasion to enquire of Gholam Ally Khan, what was the reason of this attention to the observance of secrecy in affairs which were apparently innocent. Gholam Ally Khan said, that a certain delicacy of concealment (hijalee) was to be observed in the affair of the marriage. Q. You have stated, that when you received from Gholam Ally Khan the cypher, No. 6, you considered it to be for purposes of secret communication. What was your idea of the nature of the intended secret communications? A. I concluded it to be for the purpose of concealing the mention of any affair whatever; whether relating to the English, or the Nizam, or the Mahrattas, or any other point referred to in the paper. Q. A paper of this nature is generally prepared for some particular purpose; for what particular purpose do you believe this paper, No. 6, to have been prepared?

Mem.—Great pains have been taken to explain the above question, Ally Rezza, after fully comprehending the purport, and after due consideration, states:

A. That he conceived the paper, No. 6, to have been prepared for use, in case of any necessity whatever, but that it was not intended for any particular purpose. Q. It appears that all intercourse had been suspended for a long time between the durbar of Tippoo Sultaun, and that of the nabob Wallajah; that a communication was opened on the conclusion of peace, under great suspicions and doubts on the part of the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah, with respect to the disposition of Tippoo Sultaun; and although that intercourse is stated to be merely for a friendly communication between the two durbars, yet the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah put into the hands of Tippoo Sultaun a confidential paper, calculated to conduct hidden correspondence of a general political nature. A. I acknowledge, that to an indifferent person there are strong grounds to suspect, that more was intended than appears; but I repeat, that I do not know of any particular object for which the paper, No. 6, was prepared. He, Ally Rezza, adds, that it was delivered by Kadir Nawas Khan to Gholam Ally Khan, between whom some communications passed, of which he, Ally Rezza, had no knowledge.

Mem.—The foregoing answer being judged inadequate to the weight of the question which it follows, the commissioners think it necessary to explain this deficiency in the fullest manner, to refer Ally Rezza to the distinct explanations contained in the preamble, and to attract his serious attention to the difficulty of this passage in the examination.

With a full sense of this serious exhortation, Ally Rezza repeats, that he has stated every thing within his knowledge, on the points stated in the examination; that the inconsistencies pointed out are obvious, but that he is unable to give a further explanation of them.

Q. Do you attach any other meaning to the expression of "the affair known of" except that of the proposed marriage? A. None whatever. If I had, I would have mentioned it.

Mem.—Here Ally Rezza insisted how much it would be adverse to his interests, and contrary to the devotion he owes to the comp. to withhold any part of the truth. The fac simile of the indorsement on the cypher, No. 6, is produced. Q. Do you know this hand-writing? A. I do not. Q. Where were you in the month of Zawky, of the year Shaud 1233, A. M.? A. Under displeasure at Seringapatam. Q. Were you in the habit of being in any degree consulted by Tippoo Sultaun? A. I was not consulted; Tippoo Sultaun instructed Mahomed Ghyaus and Mahomed Ghaus Khan, to say, in the event of Omdut ul Omrah making any enquiry for Ally Rezza or Gholam Ally Khan, that they attended the durbar as usual. Q. What was the object of that deputation? A. I do not know; I was in confinement. Q. Did you send any letters or messages by those ambassadors to the nabob Omdut ul Omrah? A. None. Q. Did you receive any letter or verbal message by them from Omdut ul Omrah? A. None. Q. Did you receive any letters from Kadir Nawas Khan? A. None; I had no intercourse. Q. What were the couplets which Tippoo Sultaun sent to you soon after your arrival at Madras? A. I have no recollection of them, the papers, Nos 2 and 3, are produced. Q. What are the couplets of which you acknowledge the receipt? A. Ally Rezza repeats the following couplet, which was intended, he says, to explain or serve as a key to the cypher in figures, viz:— Q. What is “the writing you know of” mentioned in the letter? A. The couplets explaining the cypher. Q. You have stated that the cypher in figures (the specimen of which is produced) was brought to Madras at the time of your return to that place from Seringapatam? A. It was first delivered to me at that time. Q. If so, it is impossible that the couplets can refer to the cypher, because by dates they appear to have been sent from Seringapatam before your departure from Madras with Id Cornwallis’s propositions? A. Ally Rezza ascribes this to some mistake of his memory, but makes no change in the matter of fact with respect to the cypher.

[The paper, No. 3, is produced.] Q. What were the expressions of friendship which Tippoo Sultaun states you to have heard from his mouth? A. I never heard any expressions of friendship from his mouth, and consider the expression to be nothing more than form.

[The papers, Nos. 1 and 4, are produced.] Q. It is stated that the nabob Wallajah dissuaded Id Cornwallis from the war. Did you hear the nabob say so? A. The nabob Wallajah did address himself particularly to me, and did use those expressions. Q. Did you believe the nabob Wallajah sincere in these expressions? A. I did not.—There was no sincerity on either part in those expressions. Q. Although you do not believe any sincerity to have been intended by the nabob Wallajah, in his expressions of friendship towards Tippoo Sultaun, do you give any credit to his professions of interference founded on his attachment to the religion of Mahomed? A. The whole is compliment. How is it possible that the nabob Wallajah could forget the indignities sustained by his own family at the hands of Tippoo Sultaun, when Abouel Wab Khan was confined, and his daughter and grand-daughter taken into the Mahal? And if there was any sincerity in these expressions of friendship, why was not the chain preserved after the departure of the princes from Madras? Q. Is the warmth of the expressions in this letter, No. 4, consistent with the general forms of civility? A. In the Western world, people are correct and limited in expressing themselves, but the people of India exaggerate extravagantly their expressions of regard. I regard the whole of the expressions in this letter, No. 4, to be exaggerated. Q. Did the nabob Wallajah actually make use of these expressions? A. It was customary for the vakeels to heighten the expressions of regard which fell from Id Cornwallis, or the nabob Wallajah, or any other person, for the purpose of conciliating the mind of Tippoo Sultaun. Q. Did the nabob Wallajah actually use the expression, “That the sultaun was the only pillar of the faith; and that with respect to himself, the state of affairs here (meaning at Madras) was well known?” A. The expression is certainly heightened; but the nabob Wallajah did allude to the difference of circumstances between himself and the sultaun, with respect to power and independence, so as to form a sufficient foundation for the representation of the vakeels.

Mem.—It being now eleven o’clock, and impossible to conclude the examination of Ally Rezza this night, great pains are taken by the commissioners to impress on him, in the most earnest manner, the absolute necessity of observing the strictest secrecy on the subject of this enquiry. It is further explained to him, that the knowledge of the circumstances of the enquiry being confined to the commissioners and himself, any disclosure of the proceedings must certainly be traced to him, and as certainly followed by the privation of his pension.—Ally Rezza stated, in a very impressive manner, the duties which he owed to the comp.; and urged, as a confirmation of his own desire to adhere to those duties, the intimate connection of his personal interests, which could in no manner be so well secured to him, as under the liberal protection and provision which he now enjoys from the company.

Vellore, 4th May 1800.—Ally Rezza again attends the commissioners, and, previous to his examination, he requests permission to state two points, which did not occur to him in the examination of yesterday. The 1st was, that at the departure of the vakeels from Madras, they had been charged with some rich presents and jewels, by the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah, for Tippoo Sultaun, which were accordingly delivered to him. The 2nd was, that the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah had expressed a strong desire of obtaining an establishment of land within the dominions of Tippoo Sultaun. The ostensible object was, the greater convenience of sending presents and pilgrims to Mecca from some place on the Malabar coast, than from any part of the Canatic; and the nabobs were in consequence desirous of obtaining an interchange of districts for this purpose.

The commissioners proceed to the examination of Ally Rezza. Q. Did you ever send to Tippoo Sultaun a description of the works of Fort St. George? A. I did. Q. By what means did you become acquainted with the description of them? A. I made the best description I was able, from my own observation, and from the information of a maistey carpenter, sent for that purpose from Seringapatam by Tippoo Sultaun. Tippoo Sultaun was desirous of building a fort on the model of fort St. George, and also an arsenal, of which the maistey took a drawing. Q. Was the nabob Omdut ul Omrah privy to this order? A. No; the order was kept secret. Q. Did you ever receive any intelligence from the nabobs Wallajah or Omdut ul Omrah of a secret nature? A. The vakeels received intelligence of the death of the king of France, with advice from Wallajah to withdraw Tippoo Sultaun’s vakeel from Pondicherry. Q. Did the nabob explain his intention in giving this intelligence? A. The nabob explained, that his motive for doing so arose from good wishes towards Tippoo Sultaun. Q. In your first visit to the nabob Wallajah, he appears to have made a proposal for the establishment of union and harmony between his highness and Tippoo Sultaun. Soon after he enquired whether any answer had been received at a subsequent period; Omdut ul Omrah enquired whether you had full powers, and postponed the communication of his sentiments until the final departure of the vakeels. He then did not make the communication until he had exacted the most solemn adjuration of secrecy. What did you suppose to be the causes of this anxiety and caution, and what did you expect to be the result of this preparation? A. I certainly expected that some affair of importance to Tippoo Sultaun, and of a secret nature, would in consequence be communicated; but I had no fixed idea of what that affair would be.

[The paper (No. 11.) is produced.] Q. What do you suppose to have been the intention of Omdut ul Omrah's proposition of friendship described in this letter? A. The establishment of cordiality. Q. Considering the long established rivalry and enmity between the two families, something more than mere cordiality appears to be imputable to the anxiety of Omdut ul Omrah? A. The prosecution of the former wars had been attended with great detriment to both parties, and he (Ally Rezza) conceives that Omdut ul Omrah's motive was to repair those losses by the preservation of peace. Q. From the general warmth of the expression in the correspondence of Tippoo Sultaun and Omdut ul Omrah, do you suppose that it was the intention to extend the union and harmony of those princes, to a means for the general advancement of the Mahomedan cause? A. I do not believe that their views were extended to any object of that kind. Q. It appears from many passages in the correspondence, as well as from the proceedings at the Jaurnah mosque, that prayers were offered for the triumph and victory of Tippoo Sultaun; if those prayers had been successful, there is no reason to believe, from the former conduct and enmity of Tippoo Sultaun, that his victory would have been attended with any temporal advantage to the nabob Wallajah's family? A. Of course the success of those prayers would have been extremely disadvantageous to the nabob Wallajah. Q. Then the object of Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah, in offering those prayers, must have been extended to the general success of the Mahomedan interests? A. It was the language of the tongue, and not of the heart. Q. Is not that language stronger than that used in the ordinary intercourse between princes? A. It certainly has the appearance of exaggeration, but to my knowledge it did not extend beyond civility.

[The paper (No 12.) is produced.]—Q. What is meant by the expression—"It is certain that no assistance will be offered from thence"? A. That the sultaun, attending to the circumstances stated in the letter, would not certainly assist the French. Q. Was there any communication between the vakeel Ram Row at Pondicherry, and the nabob Omdut ul Omrah? A. None.

Ally Rezza states, that at the time of the equipment against Pondicherry, Sir C. Oakeley acquainted the vakeels in a private manner, that Pondicherry would certainly fall into the hands of the English, and that if Tippoo should offer the French assistance, it would as certainly be attended with injurious consequences to him.

[The papers (Nos. 8 and 9.) are produced.]—Q. Consider the particular points insisted on in these letters, and explain the object of them? A. It is well known that the object of the sultaun was to unite all Mussulmans for the purpose of extirpating the English or of falling in the attempt; and the frequent repetition of oaths to his servants and army was directed solely to that object. Q. This intention of the sultaun's being well known, is it not reasonable to conclude, that the frequent allusions of the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah, to the interest taken by the sultaun in the Mahomedan cause, may be referred to the same intention, and included under the same consideration? A. I think not; but that they were expressions of civility. On one occasion the nabob Wallajah stated, that the sultaun should consider the connexion with the English to be the proper object of his religious care. Q. Was Kadir Newas Khan the only person of rank through whom communications between the vakeels and the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah passed? A. Yes. Q. Was Kadir Newas Khan acquainted with "the affair known?" A. He was. Q. Was it intended to have kept the marriage, if it had taken place, secret from the English? A. It was intended to have been effected with the knowledge of the British government. I brought presents for the purpose, which were to have been delivered in case of success; and otherwise to be returned to Seringapatam, which was accordingly done. Q. Was Kadir Nawas Khan acquainted with the use of the cypher, No. 6? A. He was; he gave it to Gholam Ally. Q. Do you recollect the particular phrases used by Omdut ul Omrah, in communicating his ultimate message previously to your leaving Madras? A. I do not; but am certain that nothing more passed with my knowledge than what I have stated. Q. You are acquainted, that your report on the works of Madras, and your exhortations to the Mussulmans at the Jaurnah mosque, have come to the knowledge of the Brit. govt: you must be sensible also, that in the one case you had taken advantage of the confidence reposed in you by the Brit. govt, as an hostage, to betray its interests under the mask of friendship; and that, in the second case, you have preached the language of rebellion in the capital of the company's dominions. In both instances you can have no doubt that you have acted contrary to the laws of nations, and are therefore liable to the resentment of the Brit. govt. The principles on which the Brit. govt acts, in reference to these points, were explained to you at the commencement of this examination; and as you will justly have forfeited all claim to its favour, if, on the examination of other persons, you should be proven to have deviated from, or to have suppressed the truth, which is the object of this enquiry; it is earnestly recommended to you by the commissioners to trace the whole subject in your mind, and to correct any errors which you may have committed, while it is yet not too late.

Memo.—The foregoing question being of a very serious nature to Ally Rezza, is translated and committed to writing; and Ally Rezza, after full consideration; delivers the following answer, written by himself in the Persian language :

A. The truth is, that in giving this information I was under the orders of my master. He gave me particular injunctions to procure information on these points, and also sent a carpenter in order to examine the works. In this case it was not in my discretion to act contrary to those orders; I therefore made known whatever I had observed. According to the rights of peace, this conduct was improper in a person entrusted: being without resource, I acted in conformity to the orders of my master. In respect to the extortion, I acted under similar circumstances. Although these acts, in a foreign territory, were improper, yet I was without resource, and acted accordingly. With regard to the recommendation, of the commissioners to trace the subject of the enquiry in my mind, in order to correct any errors which may have occurred, or any omissions of the truth, the case is this: the transactions are of long standing; in every case in which I have been questioned, have answered to the best of my remembrance; if any thing further should occur to me, I will represent it without any deviation. It is for consideration, whether a person like me, enjoying such favour from the comp. would, by concealing any matters in his knowledge, wilfully expose himself to injury. It will never be, that I shall conceal from the comp. any thing of a secret nature in my knowledge. In every point in which I have been questioned, I have represented whatever I knew; and I repeat, that if any new matter shall arise in the enquiry, I shall be ready to give information to the extent of my ability. The injunctions on the subject of secrecy having been repeated to Ally Rezza, his examination is closed; and the commissioners think it their duty to state, that throughout the examination of Ally Rezza they have observed (as far as depends on exterior manner) a ready disposition on his part to give the fullest information; and that although great inconsistencies appear in the course of the enquiry, the commissioners did not discover any wilful prevarication, or outward endeavour, to suppress the truth. J. Webbe. B. Close.

Seringapatam, 9th May, 1800.—Gholaum Ali Khaun attends the commissioners, by the direction of the hon. col. Wellesley, and they proceed to take his examination; col. Wellesley being present. The introductory paper of explanation, translated into the Persian language, [No. 15,] and prefixed to the examination of Ally Rezza, is read and minutely explained to Gholaum Ally Khaun, who acknowledges himself to understand the meaning and extent of the paper, and professes himself at the same time ready to answer any questions that may be proposed to him. The papers [Nos. 14 and 15,] of the correspondence are produced, and Gholaum Ally Khaun acknowledges the contents of them. Q. What did Omdut ul Omrah communicate to you in the secret meeting which you held with him in the garden, subsequently to the 23d of July, 1793? A. I recommended to Id Cornwallis, that before his departure, some means should be taken to establish harmony and cordiality between the families of Tippoo Sultaun and of the nabob Wallajah: and the best means which occurred to me of doing so, was that of reciprocal marriages in the two families; and this affair is the ground of the two letters, [Nos. 14 and 15.]

Q. What were the particular expressions of attachment to Tippoo Sultaun, which Omdut ul Omrah required you not to commit to writing, but to defer the communication of them until your return to the presence of your master? A. That the enmity between the families of Tippoo Sultaun and the nabob Wallajah had been removed by the interference of Id Cornwallis; and that unity had been established between them. The whole substance of the discourse, however, referred to the object already explained. Q. What answer did Tippoo Sultaun return to the communication from Omdut ul Omrah, and through what channel was that answer transmitted? A. The answer was, that on the arrival of the vakeels this communication would be made known, and taken into consideration. Q. In what manner did the affair of the proposed connexion arise? and how was it conducted? A. The object of our mission was to attend the hostages until the completion of the treaty. Tippoo Sultaun, finding that there was a disposition on the part of the nabob Wallajah to establish cordiality and harmony between the two families, thought that the best means of effecting it would be by marriage; and therefore directed the vakeels to make a proposition to that effect.

Mem.—It is explained to Gholaum Ally Khaun, that this enquiry is of great importance, and that it will be necessary for him to recollect, in order that his answers may be consistent.

A. Gholaum Ally Khaun then states, that the agitation of the affair of the connexion first originated with the nabob Wallajah.

Mem.—This answer being so inconsistent with the fact, as it appears from the correspondence and from the other testimonies; the caution is repeated: and,

A. He still adheres to the last explanation. Gholaum Ali adds, that Tippoo Sultaun, on receiving this communication, considered it to be an affair of great delicacy, and not to be conducted by writing. He therefore ordered Ally Rezza to attend the presence, and returned by him a message, with considerable presents. Q. You have stated, that the nabob Wallajah was the first agitator of this affair. In your letter [No. 15,] you state, that you have made Omdut ul Omrah the foundation of the affair. Explain the inconsistency? A. It is true that the nabob was the first agitator of it, but in a disguised manner; and therefore Omdut ul Omrah was made the instrument of communication. Q. What was the object and intention of Ally Rezza's journey from Madras to Seringapatam, during the residence of the hostages at Madras? A. The sultaun considered the affair to be of great importance, not to be committed to writing; he therefore ordered Ally Rezza to attend the presence on that point.

[The paper, No. 7, of the correspondence, is produced and read.]—Q. It is stated in this letter, that the affair cannot be committed to writing, and that therefore you (the vakeels) considered the departure of Ally Rezza to be particularly necessary? A. The departure of Ally Rezza was considered particularly necessary, "in conformity to the orders of the presence."—Gholaum Ali states, of his own accord, that after the death of the nabob Wallajah, he (Gholaum Ali) wrote to Omdut ul Omrah, renewing the negotiation by order of Tippoo Sultaun, which letter was sent to Madras by Mahomed Ghyauss of Cuddapah. The answer was not brought to him, but he has since understood from Ghyauss, that Omdut ul Omrah had said in reply, that the princesses were the daughters of the late nabob Wallajah, and his property; with which Omdut ul Omrah was not at liberty to interfere.—

Q. The proposal having originated with the nabob Wallajah, and Tippoo Sultaun having shewn his disposition to agree, by sending Ally Rezza with presents for the occasion; how did it happen that the affair failed of accomplishment, both being willing? A. The nabob Wallajah considered Id Cornwallis's leave to be necessary, but which was not obtained. This was the cause of the impediment. Q. Was the first proposal, on the part of the nabob Wallajah, communicated to the vakeels, with the knowledge of Id Cornwallis? A. The nabob said ten times, in the presence of the whole darbar, that it was proper to establish such a connection, and that, for his part, he would consent to and effect it, if his ldp would have no objection.

[The paper [No. 6.] is produced, and an immediate change was observed, as well in the countenance as in the manner of Gholam Ally Khaun.]—Q. Did you ever see this paper? A. I never saw it before this day, and do not know the intention of it.

[The paper, No. 7, is again produced.]—Q. Who is meant by the term, "The well-wisher of mankind?" A. Wallajah. Q. Why did you call him the well-wisher of mankind? A. The nabob told me to use that phrase, and not his own name Wallajah.

[The paper, No. 8, is produced.]—Q. Who is meant in this letter by the term, "well-wisher of mankind?" A. The nabob Wallajah, who was always distinguished by that name in Tippoo Sultaun's letters. Q. Who was meant by the term, "the distinguished in friendship?" A. Ally Rezza. Q. Was that a title conferred on him? A. It was a mode of address fixed for him. Q. By whom? A. The author of the letter.—Gholam Ally states, of his own accord, that formerly Tippoo Sultaun distinguished the nabob by the name of Wallajah, and latterly by that of "well-wisher of mankind." He adds also, that the paper, No. 6, contains certain figurative terms, established in the dar-al insha, or secretary's department. Q. At what time was it established? A. I do not know. Q. You say that it was established for the conduct of business in the dar-al insha. On what occasion? A. I did not attend the darbar for five years, and I suppose it to have been invented for that purpose. Q. What is meant by th's passage in No. 8, viz. "I am perfectly satisfied, that you will shew that kindness, which is becoming your exalted person, towards hearts your guests?" A. The children.

Mem.—It is necessary here for the commissioners to explain, that the witness at once gave the above answer; but, on recollection, he endeavoured to refer the term "hearts" to its literal meaning in the composition of this passage, by explaining that Tippoo Sultaun meant his hearts (which was the same as heart, i.e. the plural for the singular) should be the guest of the nabob Wallajah, and that Wallajah should bestow his affection on it. It being evident to the commissioners that the witness is wilfully prevaricating on this point, from a remarkable change of manner and countenance; it is judged proper to repeat the injunctions contained in the preamble to this enquiry, and that paper in the Persian language is again read to him and minutely explained. Gholam Ally Khaun again repeats, that he perfectly understands the paper, and acknowledges himself liable to the penalty eventually or conditionally denounced.

Q. You have stated that the nabob Wallajah expressed his desire of being distinguished by the name of "well-wisher of mankind." Recollect yourself, and describe the particulars respecting the communication of that desire? A. At the time of Ally Rezza's departure from Madras to Seringapatam, the nabob Wallajah expressed his desire to both the vakeels, that the name of "well-wisher of mankind," and not of Wallajah, should be used whenever it became necessary to mention his name. Q. Did the nabob Wallajah desire that his name might be used only in Tippoo Sultaun's letters, or did he desire that it should also be used in the letters of the vakeels? A. The vakeels being both present when Ally Rezza took leave, the nabob Wallajah said, that he was become an old man; that he was a fakir; that he had now nothing to do with the title of Wallajah, and directed the vakeels to tell Tippoo Sultaun, that he wished to be distinguished by the name of "the well-wisher of mankind." Q. Did you receive the expression of Wallajah's desire from his own mouth, or through the medium of another person? A. From Wallajah's own mouth. Q. In what place did he communicate this desire? A. In the fort, when the nabob Wallajah came last to give leave to Ally Rezza. Q. Who were present besides yourself and Ally Rezza. A. No person. Q. Did the nabob retire to a place of secrecy, as only three persons were present? A. I was sitting in my chair (he is lame and cannot move), and the nabob and Ally Rezza came close to make the communication to me. Q. Did the nabob Wallajah express any wish that any other persons or things should be distinguished by similar fictitious titles? A. No; only with respect to himself. Q. When was the title of "distinguished in friendship" first conferred on Ally Rezza? A. It appears, from the correspondence of Tippoo Sultaun, Ally Rezza was formerly distinguished by another title, which I forget; but on Ally Rezza's return to Seringapatam, he requested that his title might be encreased. This was done. Q. Did Tippoo Sultaun communicate to you this encrease of Ally Rezza's title? A. No. Q. As no communication was made to you of the encrease of Ally Rezza's titles, how was it possible for you, or for the nabob Mahomméd Ally, to know who was meant by the distinguished in friendship? A. Because Ally Rezza was himself the bearer of the letter. Q. At what time did Ally Rezza return from Seringapatam to Madras? A. I do not recollect; but believe that I can ascertain the point, from a memorandum of the preparation made by me to receive Ally Rezza. Q. Both vakeels being present at Madras, did it ever happen that one of them wrote separate addresses to Tippoo Sultaun? A. When both were present, they wrote jointly. Q. The explanation which you have given of the expression "hearts," &c. being so constrained, as to render the passage almost void of meaning; how do you reconcile the absurdity of this passage, according to your construction, with the usual style of Tippoo Sultaun's letters, which is evident and reasonable? A. I explain it thus: viz. "Our heart is in fact, or truly, [for] your house; and [for] your little ones. In this manner [for this reason] there is the fullest confidence, that kindness becoming exalted [great] characters, will be put in practice." Q. Do you think that Tippoo Sultaun would have written a passage so absolutely destitute of meaning? A. He has written it.

Mem.—After a full discussion of this construction, it is stated to the witness, that the inconsistencies and absurdities of his explanation have established a belief that he is endeavouring to conceal the true meaning, which it remains for him either to remove, or to be answerable on his responsibility to the company.

Q. On this question being first put to you, you gave a direct answer, which was intelligible; but, on consideration, you have substituted an answer which is not to be understood. A. It is true, I may have said so.

The paper, No. 6, is put into the hands of Gholaum Ally Khaun again, and he is asked, in the most serious manner,

Q. Did you ever see this paper, or not? or did you ever hear of its being brought into use? A. I now see that Omdut ul Omrah's name is at the bottom of the paper. After the death of his father, Omdut ul Omrah sent it to Tippoo Sultaun, to be used in their correspondence. Q. How do you know this? A. Because it is endorsed by one of the moonshees of Tippoo Sultaun. Q. What connection is there between the endorsement and the period you have described? and on what grounds have you fixed the period at the death of Wallajah? A. [It is impossible to obtain any answer; but he he says, that] it came in the cover of a letter, which must have been dated. I am responsible for this fact. Q. It has been explained to you, that the English govt is in possession of the records and secret papers of the late Tippoo Sultaun; and, consequently, that they have ample means of examining all persons who appear to have had any share in the transaction of his affairs; consider well, and answer this question on your responsibility to the comp.: Did you, or did you not, receive this (No. 6,) written in pencil, from Omdut ul Omrah? A. No; I did not. After further hesitation, Gholaum Ally says, if he sent it, he may have sent it by means of Ally Rezza. Q. If he sent it at the time of the death of the nabob Wallajah (as you have stated), how could he have sent it by means of Ally Rezza? A. I spoke from conjecture.

Mem.—It appears from the whole of Gholaum Ally Khaun's answers, that he is wilfully prevaricating, and that no explanation can be obtained from him. As he appears, therefore, to be callous to the manifest falsehoods in his testimony, the commissioners deem it unnecessary to pursue this part of the examination further.

Q. Was there any cypher in use in your correspondence with Tippoo Sultaun? A. If there was, it was lodged with Ally Rezza, and I understand that such a paper was given to him on his return to Madras. After further hesitation, Gholaum Ally states, that Ally Rezza desired him to take a copy of the cypher, which he declined, saying that he was not a person to be engaged in those affairs. Q. Was it ever used by Ally Rezza? A. He never told me of his having done so. Q. Did you ever hear that it was brought into use. A. Never, never. Q. Did Ally Rezza ever communicate to you that he had used it? A. One thing is true, that Tippoo Sultaun did write a letter in cypher to Ally Rezza. Q. Did it ever happen, that both vakeels being present at Madras, they corresponded separately with Tippoo Sultaun? A. No. Q. Did Tippoo Sultaun ever send any letter separately to either vakeel, when both vakeels were present at Madras? A. No. Q. Did the letter above-mentioned in cypher come to Ally Rezza alone, or addressed to both vakeels? A. Ally Rezza told me that he had received the cyphered letter, but I declined having any concern with it. Q. Was you not considered to be the principal vakeel? A. Ally Rezza had charge of the expences, and I was entrusted with political negotiation. Q. Was it usual for Tippoo Sultaun to write in cypher on the subject of your expences at Madras? A. I know that he wrote one letter in cypher. Q. Did Tippoo Sultaun ever communicate to you any circumstance whatever by means of a cyphered letter? A. No. Q. Did he ever communicate any circumstance in cypher to Ally Rezza? A. No; no letter was received. He shewed me one letter. Q. Did you ever hear that Ally Rezza had, on any occasion whatever, written to Tippoo Sultaun by means of a cyphered letter? A. I did not know of it; I never heard of it; and never was told of it. Q. What were the orders of Tippoo Sultaun for conducting your correspondence? A. He gave us no orders; none whatever. Q. Did you ever hear that Tippoo Sultaun had ordered an oath of fidelity to be administered to his servants, at the mosque in Madras? A. Yes; orders came for that purpose, which were executed by Ally Rezza.

Gholaum Ally Khaun having earnestly requested permission to retire, leave is accordingly granted to him; it being evident, from his determination to prevaricate, that no farther useful matter can be obtained from his testimony.

Seringapatam, 11th May, 1800.—Gholaum Ally Khaun again attends the commissioners, agreeably to his appointment.

[The paper, No. 7, in the correspondence, is produced.]—Q. What are the points which could not be committed to paper, and could only be communicated in person? A. The communication of the friendship and harmony which was felt for Tippoo Sultaun. Q. What sirdars are meant in the passage, "At this time the friendship and good-will of both sirdars is from God and the royal auspices?" A. Lt Cornwallis and the nabob Wallajah. Q. What appeared to you to be so extraordinary in the friendship and good-will of both sirdars, as to make you think and say that it could only have proceeded from God and the auspices of Tippoo Sultaun? A. Formerly enmity was established between the two states; I therefore considered this disposition now manifested to be a most fortunate occurrence. Q. Why did you consider what had passed between you and the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah as an unlooked-for good? A. Because I found a better disposition than I expected towards my master. Q. What was the subject alluded to in this letter, in which Tippoo Sultaun was to deliberate maturely, and to bring fully home to his mind? A. The harmony and friendship which is mentioned in the letter. Q. What was meant by the allusion in this letter to the changeableness of the times? A. The instability of human affairs; I therefore meant to impress on the sultaun's mind the necessity of forming useful friendships. Q. What was the affair which you were desirous Tippoo Sultaun should agree to? A. My object was to promote a disposition on the part of the su' aun to cultivate this friendship. Q. How did you mean to apply the passage from the poet Hafiz? Who were the friends with whom Tippoo was to maintain cordiality? and who were the enemies with whom he was to dissemble? A. I meant to impress the policy of cultivating the friendship of the two rulers, and of keeping apart from the Mahrattas and the nizams. Q. Did you at any time receive letters or messages from the nabobs Wallajah or Omdut ul Omrah, after your final return to Seringapatam? A. Soon after my return I was put under restraint, and I received no communication whatever, either by letter or message, from the nabob Wallajah, or from Omdut ul Omrah.

[The paper, No. 17, of the correspondence, is produced.]—Q. Do you recollect receiving from Omdut ul Omrah the letter, of which this is a copy? A. As it is an answer to the letter which was written under my seal, by the nabob Tippoo Sultaun, I did not receive it. Q. Did you receive any verbal message or letter from the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, or from any person in his confidence, through the channel of the ambassadors Mahomed Ghiyas and Mahomed Ghous? A. None.

[The paper, No. 20, is produced.]—Q. Do you recollect to have received this letter? A. No. Q. Was your seal sent for more than once by Tippoo Sultaun? A. No. Q. How many years are passed since the sultaun sent for your seal? A. I do not recollect; it is a considerable time, upwards of two years, as far as I can guess. Q. You say that the sultaun sent for your seal but once; two letters have been produced from Omdut ul Omrah to you, after an interval of 2 years and a half, in each of which a letter from you is acknowledged; one of them, therefore, must have been written by yourself. A. The sultaun kept my seal for 5 days, and may have prepared different covers of letters with it; I know nothing of the letter myself. Q. Did you at any time receive a letter from Kadir Newaz Khaun? A. I received one; it was a letter of recommendation. Q. Respecting whom? A. I do not recollect his name; he was a gentleman destined for this quarter; I returned no answer. Q. Did you receive any other letter from Kadir Newaz Khaun? A. No.

[The paper, No. 21, in the correspondence, is produced.]—Q. Did you not receive from Kadir Newaz Khaun, some time in the month of Rajeb 1211 Higry, a letter, of which this is a copy? A. I did receive it. Q. When? A. I have no recollection of the time. Q. It does not appear to be a recommendation of any gentleman? A. It is the only letter I received; and it might have contained a separate note of recommendation. Q. By whom was it brought? A. The gentleman above-mentioned, about a year after my return from Madras. Q. What were the contents of your letter to Kadir Newaz Khaun, which is acknowledged in this letter? A. Informing him of my arrival, and communicating the expressions of friendship and good wishes towards the sultaun. Q. What was the nature of the intimations of Kadir Newaz Khaun's attachment to Tippoo Sultaun, which occasioned Tippoo Sultaun to express through you his satisfaction? A. Nothing more than the desire already expressed of establishing and preserving cordiality and friendship between the two durbars. Q. Through what channel were the said intimations conveyed to Tippoo Sultaun? A. I delivered the message of Kadir Newaz Khaun, on my return to the presence, and acquainted him with the reception of it by the sultaun. This is the answer to my letter. Q. What did Kadir Newaz Khaun mean by saying, that the system of harmony and union between Tippoo Sultaun and Omdut ul Omrah had acquired the requisite degree of stability and firmness? A. I explain, that being a man not very opulent, Kadir Newaz Khaun was desirous of rendering his instrumentality in establishing the friendship and cordiality useful to himself, by obtaining a present from Tippoo Sultaun. Q. Did he obtain any? A. None. The object of the connection was not accomplished. Q. You must be sensible, that, from the inconsistency of your answers, you have endeavoured to frustrate the object of this enquiry, and we have explained to you that this examination will be transmitted to our superiors. We refer you, therefore, again to the serious exhortation which was given to you at the commencement of this enquiry; and, as the prevarication in your testimony is too obviously intended to conceal some matters connected with the enquiry, we recommend that you should consider the nature of the evidence you have given, lest it should subject you to the serious displeasure of the Brit. govt.

Mem.—The above question having been verbally explained to Gholam Ally Khaun, he is informed, that it will be translated into the Persian language, and sent to him in the morning (it being now very late), and that he will be required to subscribe his own answer in the same language at the bottom of the question. Gholam Ally Khaun accordingly withdraws.

Seringapatam, May 12th, 1800.—The question recorded yesterday, having been translated into the Persian language, is sent to Gholam Ally Khaun, by col. Close's moonshee, and after a considerable interval, the following note is received from Gholam Ally himself:—"The moonshee is desirous that I should write at the bottom of the paper sent to me. At one o'clock to-morrow I will wait on the gentlemen, and communicate something. For the present, I request that the moonshee may be recalled."

Seringapatam, May 14th, 1800.—In conformity to his note of the 12th inst. Gholam Ally Khaun attends the commissioners: and, after stating the reluctance which he felt for disclosing the secrets of his master entrusted to him, delivers the following answer (written by his own moonshee) to the question recorded in the proceedings of the 11th inst.: viz. "God and his prophet know and witness, that whatever was known to me from the beginning of the year 1207 to the year 1214 Higry, has been explained, without deviation or difference, before the gentlemen of the company."

Q. In your note of the 12th inst. you stated, that you had something to communicate. What is that something? A. It was my intention to mention, that on the departure of Ally Rezza from Madras, he was charged by the nabob Wallajah with a sword and saddle of value as a present to Tippoo Sultaun. It was also my intention to state, that the ink was scarcely dry on the treaty (of 1799), when Tippoo Sultaun sent for his vakeel from Pondicherry; I did not know what passed between them, but I explain the obscurity of the passage in the letter [No. 8.] by referring the word "hearts," to Tippoo Sultaun himself, and the word "Khordegaum," to the French. Q. There being the most rooted enmity between the French and the nabob Wallajah, how could Tippoo Sultaun, in a letter of civility to the latter, denominate the former the children of his highness? A. It was an allusion.

[The paper, No. 10, of the correspondence, is produced.]—Q. Did the nabob Wallajah actually communicate this intelligence to you? and did you transmit the message without addition to Tippoo Sultaun? A. I received the intelligence through the means of Kadir Newauz Khaun. On drafting the letter, I shewed it to Kadir Newauz Khaun, and he having approved of it, it was dispatched to the presence. Q. What is the meaning of this passage, viz. "What in the judgment of this well-wisher now appears expedient is this. In a short time his ldp will go to Europe, and the kests are in a course of payment. After his ldp's departure the liquidation of the kests and other points, whatever may be his highness's (Tippoo's) pleasure, will be right and proper. At present it is better to be silent in every thing, because at this time his highness's honour would at all events be called in question. When another shall arrive from Europe, the imputation will in every event and in every measure fall upon him?" A. The French—the French—the French—a thousand times the French. Q. How could the agitation of the affairs here alluded to, before the departure of lord Cornwallis, be attended with disreputation to Tippoo Sultaun? A. Because lord Cornwallis himself being a party to the treaty, any deviation from it on the part of Tippoo Sultaun, at so early a period as during his ldp's residence in India, would be particularly injurious to the character of Tippoo Sultaun. Q. How could the departure of lord Cornwallis remove any part of the disreputation of violating the treaty? A. By the possibility of their being able to conciliate the new comer to their views. Q. Do you mean to include the nabobs Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah in this intended arrangement for conciliating the new comer? A. I received the message from Kadir Newauz Khaun on the part of the nabob Wallajah, and therefore only include him in it. Q. What answer did Tippoo Sultaun return to this proposition? A. An answer was received and delivered to the nabob Wallajah, but the contents were not explained to me. The sultaun informed us that he had received our dispatch, and enclosed a letter for the nabob Wallajah from himself, which was accordingly delivered. Q. Was the letter transmitted to the nabob Wallajah by means of Kadir Newauz Khaun? A. It was delivered to the nabob Wallajah himself at one of his visits to the princes. Q. The original message from the nabob Wallajah having been verbally communicated to the vakeels, did his highness make no mention to you of the purport of the answer which he had received from Tippoo Sultaun? A. No; I made no enquiry on the subject. Q. You have stated, that the whole of the affair alluded to in this letter refers to the French; but the very subject of the letter is founded on the too frequent communication between the sultaun and the govt of Poonah. How do you reconcile this? A. It is true, that the letter refers principally to Poonah; but the nabob Wallajah's caution was general, and included all. Q. Do you understand, that in giving this advice the nabob Wallajah communicated his intention to the Brit. govt? A. I have no knowledge on this point.

[The letter in figured cypher is produced, and recognized by Gholam Alli Khaun.]—Q. Did you transmit to the sultaun the description of the works of Fort St. George, promised in this letter? A. No, we did not; who would permit us to obtain the information? Q. The Brit. govt is in possession of a very long and detailed description of the works of Fort St. George, written during the residence of the vakeels at Madras? A. It may be, but I have no recollection of it. If such a letter was written, it will have fallen into the hands of the Brit. govt. Q. At what place did you take your last leave of Omdut ul Omrah? A. At the mount. Q. As Omdut ul Omrah appears to have met the vakeels at the garden on the plan for the purpose of delivering his last message, why did he follow them to the mount? A. After our return from our meeting at the garden, we received a message from Kadir Newauz Khaun, that the nabob would entertain us at the mount, and accordingly Omdut ul Omrah came thither. Q. Had you any particular conversation with Omdut ul Omrah on that occasion? A. No; none whatever. Q. Had you any particular conversation at the garden when you took leave of Omdut ul Omrah? A. None. That meeting was 5 or 6 months previous to our actual departure. Q. Was the affair which Omdut ul Omrah required you not to commit to writing, communicated only to yourself, or to both the vakeels? A. To both. Q. Was there at that meeting any conversation between yourself and Omdut ul Omrah unknown to any other person? A. Yes: We conversed on the subject of the connection by marriage, and of the harmony of Tippoo Sultaun and the English, during which time Ali Rezza was on one side. Q. Was there any separate conversation between yourself and Omdut ul Omrah at the tomb? A. Yes. There was on the subject of the connection. Q. It appears that you held private conversations with Omdut ul Omrah at the mosque, and in the garden; recollect whether you had not also yourself a separate conversation with him at the mount? A. None whatever.—Gholam Alli Khaun retires. (Signed) J. Webber. B. Close.

Translation of a Letter from Mohiuddin Osman, Vakeel at Madras, to Hyder Ally Khan; dated 6th of Zyked 1186, (30th Jan. 1773).—"Agreeably to your orders, I had an audience of the nabob, at which, after expressing in strong terms the friendship that subsisted between us, I requested the passport for the arms. Immediately on hearing these expressions of friendship, his highness acquiesced in my demand of the passport, and taking me by the hand, led me to the top of the house, where there was a room, from whence the beautiful prospect of the sea, Fort St. George, &c. like a plain, appearing to our view, he remarked what a beautiful spot it was, and added, "May Almighty God soon produce a cause, from which the nabob Hyder Ally Khaun and I shall be enabled here to set and enjoy ourselves together." He proceeded in these words, "The nabob Hyder Ally Khaun, inattentive to the value of my friendship, has always considered me separate from himself; whilst I have ever considered us as one: I may say indeed that I look on his existence as my own flesh and skin, and it is incumbent upon him to do the same. It is necessary that a friendship should subsist between us so firm, as that both our countries also should be one; that if any enemy, (which God prevent), should burn one of his villages, I ought to feel as if one of my own was consumed; and were one of mine to be destroyed by the fire of an enemy, he ought to feel as if one of his were destroyed: Again he observed, your master may make many friends, and doubtless will, but such a friend as I am he never can acquire; when friendship shall be established between us, then it will be seen what the friendship of friends is. I am that friend who, if he (which God prevent) should require the sacrifice of my child, as a means of promoting his prosperity and dominion, would, looking upon this as the greatest blessing in the world, most willingly deliver my offspring up to him. It is my wish to establish such a friendship with your master, that our children after us may be united in the bonds of affection and of love. Let us therefore, during this transitory life, be friendly and united, and render good offices to each other, since in the next no person can be connected with another; it is indeed singularly happy that Almighty God has been so bounteous to each, as that we want for nothing else than friendship and affection; it is incumbent upon us mutually to transmit to one another presents and rarities, &c. which God has bestowed on both, which, amongst friends, is a source of satisfaction, a means of over-awing others, and in every respect seemly. If therefore any thing in your master's country should be wished or required by me, let me take it without any apology; and in like manner should he want any thing from mine, let him send for it without excuse; this is the mode in which the princes of former times displayed their friendship for each other, and in the present times it is the same." Your slave, Mohunmud Osmaun, upon hearing all these friendly expressions, made the two following remarks, "Almighty God has bestowed upon your highness, the nabob, a general knowledge of every matter, and a clear understanding, my master, Hyder Ally, contemplating by anticipation from his own great foresight all that I have now heard, and wishing to promote a unity with you, addressed to you a letter, wherefore did your highness not write him in return?" He answered, "I am convinced that your master wrote me that letter of condolence in friendship; but while I cherished in my mind his friendly sentiments, I judged it unprosperous and improper, as a beginning of friendship, to reply to a letter of condolence, and therefore failed to write to him; but should he wish in future to maintain a correspondence with me, I will look upon him, and address him as a king." My second observation was as follows: "Almighty God has made your highness powerful and great. The Mahrattas you know to be evil-minded and wickedly disposed; during three years they were at war with my master, and over-run and destroyed his country to the value of many crores. Notwithstanding his repeated demands of assistance from you, with an offer of paying the expences of the troops, how did you continue inattentive to his wish, and an inactive spectator? It would appear then, that you were unwilling to have him for a neighbour, or a friend, and preferred the neighbourhood, or friendship, of the Mahrattas," He replied, "The sentiments you express are precisely my own. May the Almighty destroy and root out the Mahrattas. It is with this object in view, that I am anxious to establish an alliance with your master, that in future whatever we may do may be concerted and engaged in with one heart and tongue, whether to make war or peace, because hitherto he has not, in the first instance, made applications to me, nor communicated with me, upon any subject. When he attacked the Europeans, and made peace with the English, who were my servants, it depended upon my consent to conclude it. I was the prince and owner of the country, and was at no great distance from the scene; but not a word, not a sentence, not even a man did he think proper to send to me. Hence I could not but conclude, that he wished not to be in unity and friendship with me, and consequently what ought I to have to do with his other wars and pacifications. Had your master maintained friendship and correspondence with me, and had I then neglected to fulfil my obligations, and remained an inactive spectator, these might be grounds for complaint: But let us totally forget the past, and if the nabob Hyder Ally Khaun should conceive that nothing or no advantage is to be gained from my friendship; let him reflect that the most trifling degree of its advantage is this; that if every year, whatever number of arms he may be able to purchase and carry away from this quarter, he may do so without molestation; it is no less a privilege than what he possesses in his own country. In the present instance, when you applied for a passport to the gov't, you knew the answer he gave; he does not chuse to comply with your request. Upon a principle of foresight, I consider your master's friendship as paranoiant to every thing; it is incumbent likewise on your master to do the same by me, and continue firm in his friendship, for our two hearts are in reality one." His highness further added, that an odd incident had occurred, and told me, laughing at the same time, that when your highness came down upon the English, he was in this very garden where we were, and sending answers to the letters which he received; that the people told him, "To-day the English gentlemen are embarking upon a pilgrimage." Here the conversation broke up, and his highness desired me to come to-morrow for the dustuck. P.S. In your former letter to the nabob, your address was such as to produce an observation from him, "That people in general write thus to their scr-vants." It will be necessary therefore to consider this in future, that no offence may be taken. His highness gave me an English pocket book, as a present for you, which I enclose. If you send him something handsome in exchange, I think it would be proper.

No. 17.—Minute of Lord Clive, dated 29th Sept. 1801, relative to the pecuniary Provision to be made for the Families of the late Nabobs Mahomed Ali and Omdut ul Omrah, &c. &c.

Minute of Lord Clive, in Council, 29th Sept. 1801.—I have the honour of communicating to the board a statement of the pecuniary provision which I propose to make for the family of their late highnesses the nabob Mahomed Ally and the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, as well as for the principal officers and dependants of the late gov't.

This statement has been prepared in communication with his highness the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah. Reason therefore exists for believing that the provision now proposed extends to every branch of the family, and that the comp. will be liable to no further expence for its support.—It appears by the accounts with which I have been furnished from the durbar of the nabob, that the appropriation of the family jagheers by the nabob Mahomed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah has been extremely capricious; by these means many members of the family have lived in the enjoyment of superfluous abundance, while the greater part has with difficulty commanded the means of subsistence. This mode of appropriation has therefore afforded no guide for the allotment of the pecuniary stipends; and I have judged it most expedient to divide the family and its connexions into separate classes, according to the respective gradations of the different branches.—In proposing half a lack of rupees for the support of each of the legitimate sons of the nabob Mahomed Ally, I have allowed myself perhaps to exceed the bounds which a strict interpretation of the situation of those princes might justify; but I have been unwilling to detract from the liberality by which the Brit. govt. has been guided throughout the recent transactions connected with this family; and it did not appear to be consistent with this plan of arrangement, that a less income should be allotted to the legitimate sons of Mahomed Ally, than that appropriated to the support of the elder sons of the late Tippoo Sultaun. To the inferior branches of the family I have allotted stipends, calculated in a relative proportion, according to the respective classes to which they have been referred.—Some oppressive exactions having been made by Hussain ul Mulk (the second surviving son of the nabob Mahomed Ally) in his capacity of fonjdar of Trichionopoly, particularly in the pagoda of Seringam, the means of recompensing the sufferers will hereafter be a subject of consideration for the govt. in council, but I shall consider it indispensably necessary to apply a great portion of the stipend of Hussain ul Mulk to this purpose; for the same reason I shall propose to reimburse the comp. in the amount of the arrear paid to the troops of sultan ul Nissa Begum, the favourite sister of the late nabob Omdut ul Omrah, from the stipend allotted to that princess.—The only deviation I have admitted from the principle of distributing the family into classes, is in favour of Tudjul Omra, the eldest reputed son of the late nabob Omdut ul Omrah. The operation of that principle would have referred him to the class of Nekare sons, and perhaps a strict interpretation of his condition might be more consistent with that principle, because a deviation in his favour can only be founded on considerations connected with his former rank and expectations, and might therefore be liable to the imputation of encouraging hopes, which having been decidedly cut off it may be unwise to indulge. I am disposed however, in the present state of circumstances, to consider Ally Hussain to be more an object of compassion than of danger, and I think that the proposed stipend of Rs 24,000. per annum, affords sufficient means of gratifying his wishes, without encroaching on the expediency of suppressing his pretensions to the government of the Carnatic.—The list of the officers of the late government is not extensive, and the provision which I propose to make for them is liberal. Of the four principal officers of the nabob Omdut ul Omrah, introduced to the deputies after the death of that prince, I have included only Tucky Ally Khan; and I have allotted to him a stipend proportioned to his former rank in the durbar. Nejeeb Khan (the other person named in the will of Omdut ul Omrah) holds at present a jagheer, which will hereafter come under the consideration of the board, and will afford, I have no doubt, ample means of maintaining that khan. The part which Hadir Nawaz Khan has acted in the extraordinary negotiations of the late nabobs Mahomed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah, has rendered it impossible to include him in the arrangement of the affairs of the Carnatic upon the present foundation; and with respect to Mr. Barret, it will be manifest, from the description of that person contained in the report of the deputies, that the same considerations do not apply to him, which apply to the Mussulmen gentlemen of rank and character in the service of the late government.—The three princes connected with the family of the emperor Delhi have, I understand, resided in the neighbourhood of this presidency, and have been supported by the bounty of the late nabobs Mahomed Ally and Omdut ul Omrah during a long period of time; I have therefore judged it necessary, in framing the present arrangement, to secure to persons of their description the certain means of subsistence through the channel of the comp.'s govt.—Having concluded these arrangements with his highness the nabob, in conformity to the stipulations of the treaty, I consider it to be consistent with the spirit of that instrument, to give every appearance of support to the dignity and rank to his present highness, and to restrain the spirit of hostility which has been avowed by many branches of the family towards the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah. While therefore I propose to secure to each branch of the family the actual enjoyment of the pension allotted to it, by rendering it payable at the comp.'s treasury to such persons as may be appointed to receive it, I judge it to be indispensably necessary, to the preservation of good order and harmony in the family, that the receipts to be granted by the different members of it should be previously subjected to the nabob's inspection, and that the payment of the pensions shall be suspended unless such receipts shall bear the seal and signature of his highness.—I consider it to be extremely desirable that every precaution shall be used for securing the happiness and comfort of the nabob on the foundation of the present arrangements; in order therefore to preserve his highness from the errors of his predecessors, to defend him from the machinations of interested persons, to restrain his expences within the limit of his income, and to impress constantly on his mind the principles of his connection with the Brit. govt. I judge it to be expedient that a person should be appointed to attend his highness's durbar, and to hold a constant personal communication with him on the part of this government. The general objects of this arrangement will be subject to the immediate superintendence of the government; and the duties of the subordinate office, which I propose to create, will be directed to the maintenance of that intercourse, to the timely communication of the intended measures of the nabob, and to the establishment of an immediate controul, under circumstances contributing at the same time to the honour and respect due to his highness's station.—The nature of these duties is such as to require the appointment of a Mussulman of good character and understanding, rather than an European gentleman. I have the best opinion of the fidelity of Gholam Hussain, the principal moonshy in the Persian office, and of his qualifications to discharge the duties of that station with satisfaction to this govt, and advantage to the comp. I propose accordingly to nominate Gholam Hussain to attend (under the immediate orders of the govt) the durbar of his highness the nabob, with a salary of 100 pagodas per month, and with an allowance of 50 pagodas for equipage and servants. These sums of money it is my intention to charge on the fund to be appropriated to the support of the family and dependants of the nabob. The board will observe, by the statements which I have the honour of communicating to it, that the amount of the proposed pecuniary provision for the family and dependants of the nabob, is less than the amount appropriate to that purpose, according to the stipulations of the treaty of 1792; and the nature of the present arrangement is calculated to secure a gradual diminution of this expenditure. I propose that the payment of the stipends shall commence from the 1st day of Oct.

No. 18.—Copy of a Paper, purporting to be a Letter from Hussain Ally, the reputed Son of the late Nabob of Arcot, to James Stuart Hall and Samuel Johnstone, Esquires, his Agents in London. (This Paper will be found in our Register, Vol. i. p. 1389.)

[As we shall have repeated occasions to refer to Mr. Dundas's Speech on the Situation of Affairs in India, at the period of his retiring from office, we have thought it proper to insert a correct copy of it.]

Mr. Dundas's Budget Speech in the House of Commons, on the 12th of June, 1801.

When I undertook the task of stating this year the situation of Indian concerns, in the manner I have been accustomed to do when in office, it was my original intention to have confined this statement to a dry recital, in the shape of resolutions, of the result of the accounts and estimates on the table. My reasons for this were, first, that with the opinions I entertain of the result of the administration of India, for 17 years past, under its present system, I could not well take a retrospective view of its past, compared with its present situation, without being liable to the imputation of an ostentatious display of occurrences, in which I may be supposed to have had a considerable share; and secondly, if I was to indulge myself in too flattering a prospective view of future expectations, I might be accused of holding out sanguine predictions on future events, respecting which I had no responsibility, and the fulfilment of which was to depend upon others, and not upon myself. But upon a nearer view of the subject, and considering the manner in which I concluded my statement of last year, I have persuaded myself, that it would be both unmanly and uncandid on my part, at this moment, if I was to conclude with barely recording resolutions, stating the results arising out of the accounts which have been referred to the committee. I concluded my statement of last year in the following words:—"The final result of the whole is, the financial departments in India have experienced material deterioration, from the united pressure of war expences, and provision of investments; but not in a degree to afford ground of alarm. A large proportion of the increase of the debt has been the occasion of adding to the assets, from whence the home concern has been considerably enriched. It certainly is of the first importance to devise a method by which the present burthens on India may be relieved; and I am happy in being enabled to remark, that the means for accomplishing this desirable object are to be found in various ways:—in principles of economy, as to the future expenditure; and in a proper application of the increased resources abroad. An examination must likewise be made, by what mode the home treasury can contribute to the diminution of the foreign debt. From the circumstances of the war, the establishments have been considerably extended. It will be a point of my diligent and close attention, that every practicable reduction shall be carried into effect, from which, with the favourable prospect to be indulged from the stability and permanence of the resources, and the unexampled prosperity of the commerce, no apprehensions need be entertained on account of the magnitude of the present debt: I am prepared, indeed, to meet it at 14 millions. My confidence in the means of retrieving the state of the finances abroad is further strengthened, by reference to the experience of former times. The situation of the comp. on the first establishment of the present system, is well known to have been such, that the full extent of their difficulties could not be ascertained till the year 1786. In 1797, I took occasion to offer to the committee a most flattering view of the surprising improvement brought about in the course of 10 years. The reduction of the debts, and the increase of the assets, were to an amount exceeding £11,000,000. It is true, that within that period, money had been raised on additional capital to the amount of £3,740,000; but it must likewise be taken into consideration, that the remainder may be termed a net improvement, under the events of an Indian war, at one time threatening serious disasters, though finally concluded, highly to the advantage of the comp.: under the events, likewise, of the present European war, during four years of the period, which caused enormous additions to the expence of freights, and of the provision of every article of equipment; and occasioned also great expences by several expeditions, from which our rivals were deprived of their possessions in the East. But I have carried the comparison 3 years further, which will take in a great part of the immense expence of the late war with Mysore, and find, that the improvement, during these 13 years, on the same principle, is £11,880,000. If it be inquired, what is the state of the concern between 1796-7, and the date of the present accounts, in which period the extraordinary pressure has been mostly felt, it is satisfactory to discover, that without any aid from increase of capital, the improvement has still been £747,000. It is fair, then, to infer, that so far from apprehensions, the most sanguine hopes may be indulged, from the present general aspect of the comp.'s affairs, whether considered politically or commercially; that unless any thing unforeseen should occur, the debts may, in a few years, be reduced to the amount of which it may be prudent to limit them; and that the surplus produce of the revenues may be applied to the purposes intended, when the last arrangement took place." These words have been given to the public, and therefore both my successors, and the public at large, have a right to expect from me, at the close of my Indian administration, that I should more distinctly explain the grounds of those expectations which I had thus held out. Although, in the discharge of this task which I impose on myself, I may be obliged to refer to past transactions, I shall refrain from doing it, either ostentatiously or in great detail; but if I am to state my expectations as to the future, it is impossible for me to do so, without stating the grounds on which my confidence rests. The change of system, in consequence of the institution of the present mode of administration, forming an æra rather remarkable in the annals of the E. I. comp. from the particular situation of their affairs, as well as from the clashing of interests and opinions occasioned thereby; it may not be altogether foreign to the present purpose, and particularly from the peculiar circumstances under which I have the honour to address the committee, if I take a view of some of the events, which have since contributed to the increase of our power and influence, and to their establishment on a basis not likely soon to be shaken. Beginning with the state of affairs in India, both as it concerns our external relations, and the internal situation of our own extensive and valuable possessions, it is with the most heartfelt satisfaction my mind contemplates the amazing change in our political relations in the East, at the present time, compared with what they were in 1784. A circumstantial detail of the many vicissitudes within the period, cannot be expected to be given, in the narrow space of time allotted to this enquiry: let it partly suffice to say, that by a happy combination of efforts, both abroad and at home, effects have been produced, which could scarcely have entered the minds of the most sanguine. In the year 1784, peace had been recently obtained from our inveterate and determined enemy, the late Tippoo Sultaun, as a boon, in fact, essential to the preservation of our possessions on the peninsula of India, for the most part suffering from the ravages of war, to a degree which peace and time alone could recover. The period following that peace, till the unprovoked hostility on the lines of our ally, the rajah of Travancore, was little more than an unceasing expectation of war. It then became necessary, not only upon the faith of treaties, but upon principles of self-defence, to enter again upon a most arduous conflict with our enemy, in the plenitude of his power, the issue of which rested, at one time, upon a very precarious balance, till the rare and singular talents of him, whose name must ever be mentioned with gratitude and reverence, were called forth. (The noble and respectable character to whom I allude is the marq. Cornwallis.) Such, however, was the nature of the contest, that two campaigns were requisite to bring it to an end; and truly glorious it was, affording at once a display of British prowess in arms, and moderation in victory. The face of affairs was then completely changed. Peace was our grant, when summary vengeance was at our command. Policy and prudence required that the enemy should be reduced in his power, and justice prescribed, that our allies and ourselves should receive some reimbursements of the expences we had respectively incurred: he was, therefore, not only amerced in a considerable sum, but stripped of the half of his dominions. The next interval of peace bore a near resemblance to the last: and it has been clearly ascertained, that the fixt bias of the mind of our enemy, was not only the recovery of his dominions, but also the accomplishment of our utter destruction. The day at length arrived, when forbearance could no longer be exercised with common attention to the safety of our own interests. A new war became essentially necessary, which, by the most signal exertions of wisdom, energy, and courage, was soon brought to a termination, in the death of him who provoked it, and in the entire conquest of his dominions. These great events, and the arrangements in consequence, are on the records of parliament; but I have adverted to them, in order to display the secure and permanent foundation on which our possessions are, at this time, held in that part of India. The accounts before the house will shew the pecuniary advantages derived from them: a reference to the map will discover, that we are now possessed of an extended territory, with a reduced frontier: and it further appears, that we are relieved from the dread of a power, which for a long series of years had, in connection with our common enemy, been bent, if possible, on our very expulsion from India. Such has been the extension of our power and influence in this part, since the year 1784. If we look to the state of our alliances with the several powers in India, on the same comparison, the view is equally satisfactory. 1st. The nizâm: although allied by treaty during a long series of years, the advantages to the comp. were frequently problematical, from the fluctuating politics of his court; and although his highness furnished some assistance towards the object of the last war with Tippoo, and reaped his proportion of the advantages from the successful termination of it; very soon after an influence prevailed in his councils, threatening serious consequences. By the judicious and decisive conduct of the present gov. gen. that influence has been destroyed, our common enemy deprived of any prospect of annoying us from that quarter, and this alliance rendered truly valuable. It was to this circumstance we were indebted for the useful co-operation of his highness's forces in the late Mysorean war, and to this circumstance may likewise be attributed the happy event of our connection with Hydrabad being now more firmly cemented than ever. A new treaty has been lately entered into, stipulating for a considerable increased subsidiary force; and instead of leaving the payment of the subsidy to the uncertain receipts of his own treasury, he has assigned to the comp. the whole of the territories acquired from the late sultân of Mysore. By this measure, the possibility of dispute between the two powers, on the score of punctuality of payment, will be effectually removed, and the comp. will receive ample remuneration for the expence of the forces supplied by them. The treaty with the rajah of Travencore, though not productive of advantages to so great an extent, may still be mentioned as an event, within the period alluded to, tending to strengthen our influence. Our more particular connections on this side of India are the nabob of Arcot, the rajah of Tanjore, and the nabob of Surat. The nabob of Arcot:—the alliance with his family is well known to have been of very ancient date. The identity of interests between him and the comp. is obvious. The treaty under which our present relation with him stands, was dated in 1792, and was entered into with his father, on terms extremely favourable to him. I have several times mentioned to the house, my wish, that treaty might undergo some modifications: the interests of the comp. and the welfare of the inhabitants of the districts under his highness's govt, required it. That it has not yet taken place, is no proof of any thing against our general influence, as no apprehension whatever is to be entertained of his power. With the rajah of Tanjore we stand upon far better grounds. I have formerly intimated to the house, the change introduced in this alliance, and the act of justice by which the present rajah was restored to his right. Districts were, in the first place, assigned to the comp. for the payment of the subsidy; but as this occasioned a species of divided government, and our system of management was far better calculated to restore this fruitful country to a state of prosperity, the young rajah, very wisely, chose to assign the whole to our direction, reserving a respectable stipend, for the support of the splendor of his own house and that of his family. A treaty was accordingly concluded to that effect in the year 1799. The nabob of Surat might not, perhaps, be thought of sufficient importance to introduce upon this occasion; but having adverted to the new arrangements with him, in the examination of the Bombay accounts, it is proper to state, that by the grants in 1759, the exclusive management of this city, and its dependencies, was particularly vested in the comp. From that period, however, it was thought proper to have a joint direction with the reigning nabob, till the last year, when it was deemed prudent, that the company's original rights should be re-established, and that the collection of the revenues, the civil government, and the military defence, should be placed wth their servants. This was finally adjusted by an amicable compromise. A handsome stipend has been given to the nabob, and allowances granted to such of his dependants as appeared to have claims. I have first noticed the several powers with whom we are in strict alliance on this side of India, as being nearest the more immediate and active scene of political operations and changes; but the improvement of the connexion and influence with the nabob of Oude is of no less consequence to the interests of the comp. The occurrences since the death of the late nabob have been formerly brought to the notice of the house, and the hope that was entertained of the present nabob being induced to discharge his own useless and ill-disciplined army, and to employ an additional number of the comp's troops. This has been completely brought to effect, and at the same time the comp. derive substantial advantages, the real expence to the nabob will be diminished. Thus, we find, every alliance at this moment most completely strengthened, a very large annual resource obtained, and while the friendship of the parties is effectually secured, the subsidiary force employed still forms an integral part of the defence of our own dominions. If we turn our attention to other powers of the east, a view entirely satisfactory presents itself. From the present state of the Mahratta empire, I see no cause for apprehending the interruption of tranquillity, independent of its being the interest of its rulers to maintain the principles of harmony and peace. But if it were even at the zenith of its power, and hostily disposed, our own situation is, at this time, such, as not to dread the utmost consequences. The friendly disposition of the Burman empire, is another proof of the great respect wth which we are viewed by our neighbours. I trust it will therefore be admitted, even from this abstract view, that with regard to our influence in the East, it is such as to gratify the wishes of the most sanguine. But a still further ground of satisfaction arises, from the recollection that our formidable European rivals have not only been expelled from their own possessions, but are, by the events now stated, effectually deprived of the power of seriously endangering our interests. I think it proper, however, to observe, that while I give this flattering view of our political situation in India, it is not with any intention to lull our rulers into any supine or dangerous security. It would be an unwarrantable indiscretion on my part, if I was, on such a subject, to enter into any detail. I say, in general, that unremitting vigilance and watchfulness are as necessary as ever. Having got the better of old combinations, and annihilated the force of ancient enemies, do not let us suppose that circumstances may not arise to produce new confederacies, and a system of intrigue, not less dangerous, though differently directed. Those who have given a comprehensive consideration to this subject will, without further explanation, understand me, when I direct their vigilant attention to the state of Persia, to the northern frontiers of Hindostan, to the mouths of the Indus, and to the gulphs of Persia and Arabia. I shall now refer to the state of our own immediate dependencies, and the govt. of them. Here a most flattering picture presents itself, inasmuch as we have the satisfaction of knowing, that at the same time the comp.'s resources have, during the period alluded to, been carried to the highest pitch of prosperity; the situation of the inhabitants of these extensive dominions has been considerably ameliorated; and every measure is adopted, that with the security of the established demand of the state, those who pay that demand shall likewise enjoy every security in their persons and interests. The advantageous terms of the permanent settlement, and the beneficial tendency of the judicial regulations in Bengal, need not now be mentioned, having been often before brought to the notice of the house; but merely as a display of the superior policy of the present system, under which, at the same time that every species of force or compulsion, further than what is prescribed by known and promulgated laws, is done away, the resources are fully realized, and the land-rents carried to an almost unprecedented extent, as already observed. From the experience of this system in Bengal, it has been thought fit to extend it, as far as practicable, to every province under the comp.'s govt; and orders have been issued to the presidencies of Madras and Bombay for that purpose.

The internal govt. of these presidencies improve every year. As to Bombay, the revenues of the province of Malabar had, for the two last years, much increased in produce, as well as in facility of collection. One refractory tributary alone remained, who made the most ungrateful return for the clemency shewn him. Little doubt need be entertained but he will soon be effectually subdued. A material change has lately taken place on this side of India, by the transfer of the Malabar province to the entire superintendence of the Madras govt. The numerous tributaries under this govt. are now happily brought to that state of subjection, as to furnish the hope, that the frequent insurrections which I had the mortification to learn by the advices, will no more be heard of. Their expectation of support, and indeed the main spring of every revolt, being effectually removed, in the death of Tippon, every hope may be entertained of the perfect establishment of the quiet of the country. This has, in part, been already obtained amongst some of the most refractory, the southern Poligars, who are now reported to be changed from an armed and lawless banditti to a peaceful and industrious peasantry. The tranquillity of the northern Circars has frequently been interrupted, by the restless and turbulent disposition of some of the zemindars. Military aid has, on many occasions, been requisite to establish the authority of govt. A more favourable prospect presents itself with regard to these districts likewise, the vigorous exertions, very properly called forth, having convinced the rebellious of the inefficacy of their attempts. But the time is fully arrived for the complete assumption of every power of govt. The happiness of the numerous inhabitants of those parts renders it incumbent that they should receive the full benefits of a mild administration, in common with other classes of the subjects of the Brit. dominion; and that their quiet, and in fact their lives, should no longer be exposed to the caprice of subordinate rulers. The orders for the general assimilation of the system of govt, both revenue and judicial, are therefore very properly timed. From the various habits and prejudices of the land-holders and inferior renters, on this side of India, the full effects of this benevolent system may not so soon be proved as in Bengal. The jealousy of authority entertained by some of the zemindars may likewise occasion interruption; but no doubt exists, that steady and unshaken perseverance will eventually secure to the inhabitants all the benefits intended, and to the comp. the same advantages which they have reaped in the provinces of Bengal. This favourable prospect is further strengthened by the prudent plans adopted, as far as practicable, that the minds of the people should be prepared for the change, by their gradual introduction in some of the districts. In every case, however, the due consideration paid to their prejudices, cannot fail of producing the ready assent of all, who are not influenced by motives of private interest, in the perpetuity of the present divided mode of govt. The secure and easy collection of the rents of the country, is certainly an inducement to the introduction of this plan into the whole of the dominions; but it may likewise be safely averred, that the happiness and interest of the millions of industrious inhabitants is likewise one of the great and leading motives. The example of the Bengal provinces is sufficient to justify the intention, where the ready means of knowing the laws by their general promulgation, with those of obtaining justice, has produced the happiest effects; and it is certainly desirable; while the attempt is laudable, to secure the demands of the state, without the recourse to military coercion, which has unhappily been so frequently requisite in the districts under the Madras govt. If I had been the sole actor in those beneficial consequences which have resulted from the recent administration of India, I should not have felt it decorous on my part to have alluded to them, even in the general way I have done; but I owe it, in common justice, to those who have either assisted with their judgment in the formation of plans, or their active exertions in carrying them into execution: and it cannot fail of affording high satisfaction to the committee, to be informed, that every measure, whether relating to revenue or police, has been undertaken, no less with the view to the comfort and welfare of the Indian subjects, than to the advantage of the state. Having distinctly explained, from year to year, most of these measures, a further recapitulation is not now wanting. I shall, therefore, proceed to state, that the improvement of the commercial system, generally, has been equally an object of marked attention. The most liberal encouragement has been given that the productions of the fertile provinces under our dominions, should yield every advantage to the cultivators of the soil, to the manufacturers of goods, and to the adventure of the private merchant. Taxes discovered to be oppressive, have been uniformly abolished; and it may be safely averred, that a greater freedom of trade is enjoyed under our govt than in any other part of India. As to Bengal, by the official accounts, the general increase of the trade has been stated with great clearness and precision. Articles of support, as formerly remarked to the committee, not known till late years, have been cultivated to an immense extent. That of indigo, particularly, has flourished in a most flattering degree; produced both in quantity and quality, so as to offer a formidable rivalry to those, from whom it was supplied in other quarters of the world. It may be said, that disappointments have occurred in the speculations of some individuals engaged in the trade; but it frequently happens, that a lucrative branch of commerce will so much engage the public attention as to be carried beyond the current demand. The level always, however, returns. But with regard to this article, a most essential and truly valuable end would have been gained, if it had only been discovered, that the ability existed to supply our own manufactures, without having recourse, as formerly, to the assistance of foreign merchants. The probability of the demand being still further extended cannot fail of affording the highest gratification. The increased produce of sugar and of cotton might likewise be mentioned, as well as other articles; but it would carry me into a larger detail than might, at this time, be proper. The trade of the districts under the presidencies of Madras and Bombay cannot be exactly ascertained, as at Bengal, from the want of similar official documents. But that of the comp. at the former presidency in particular, has increased in a very great degree, and would have been carried to a further amount, but for the pressing demands upon the treasuries, in consequence of the war. The way in which it has happily terminated, affords the prospect of the comp. being enabled to avail themselves of the industry of the whole of the peninsula, to their own advantage, to that of the inhabitants, both native and European, and no less so that of this country, from the increased demand which will arise for its manufactures. It will therefore be admitted, that the commercial prosperity of India strongly corroborates what I have adduced, with regard to the improvements in other respects. Many objections have been, from time to time, raised to the policy of the restrictions imposed by the legislature on the trade of the East, and to the exclusive privileges placed in the comp. My decided sentiments on this subject are well known; I will, therefore, only now advert to it, by observing, that at the renewal of the charter in 1793, the legislature shewed every disposition to adopt such arrangements, as might secure to this country as large a share of the Indian trade as possible. If any of the arrangements then made have been found by experience inadequate to the objects in view, the wisdom of the legislature, and I trust a liberal and wise policy on the part of the East India comp. will concur in correcting former error. The manner in which this may be done, consistent with those regulations which parliament has thought proper to impose, has long been under serious consideration. Many indulgencies have already been granted to individuals; and I have no doubt that, ultimately, such a plan will be determined upon, as may be the means of affording all the satisfaction which, in reason and justice, could be expected. In doing this, I certainly do not mean to exclude every degree of proper caution; for I have no hesitation in expressing my thorough conviction, of its being incumbent on those with whom the final arrangement of this very important branch shall rest, never to lose sight of those salutary maxims, which have been prescribed by long experience, and that they be strictly upon their guard, that substantial and permanent benefits may not be sacrificed to casual, and perhaps illusory schemes of gain. The trade with China is well known to be a most consequential part of our commercial interests, not only as it concerns the particular advantages of the comp. but likewise as it concerns the empire in the demands for the manufactures, and to the material aid afforded to the revenue. It is, therefore, I have the greater satisfaction in bringing to view its prosperous state in every point. The credit of the comp. has always stood high in the opinion of the Chinese merchant, for notwithstanding, at one period, the arrear to them was considerable, their confidence has not diminished, and no interruption has occurred; if that was the case under such circumstances, the situation of affairs in China, at this time, must be admitted to wear a very pleasing aspect. The balance owing at Canton, in 1798, was £1,073,607: by the accounts upon the table, there was a balance in favour of the comp. of no less than £1,226,079, arising from cash in the treasury, goods in warehouse, or afloat homeward, or advances for future investments; making a difference, in that period, of no less than £2,299,686. The consequence is highly propitious. The exchange upon India has materially benefited; and an opportunity has been afforded the govt of Bengal, to make the attempt to turn this favourable circumstance to the utmost advantage, in every possible respect. The effect has been already felt, in the revival of the trade in opium, the principal demand for which is in these seas. It has also been experienced in other branches of Indian produce. While every facility of export is given from our own provinces, the Canton treasury is opened for bills on the several presidencies, so that the consignee is assured of the return of the proceeds of his adventure. The bullion heretofore sent from Europe to China may go to India, to the enrichment of our possessions there: it will therefore appear, that the benefits resulting from this trade will not be merely confined to this country, but will be extended, in a great degree, to every part of the dominions in the East. The view of this trade, on a comparison with its amount in the year 1784, is particularly favourable to my present object. The sales, in the year 1784-5, of which tea formed the principal part, amounted to £2,219,000. In the year 1800-1, they were £3,616,000; the progressive increase, since the passing the commutation act, was last year noticed to the committee. If the attention is directed to the state of affairs at home, on which I shall now offer a few remarks, every ground is afforded for the most satisfactory inferences. Here is found the grand criterion from which to form a judgment of the advantages which the empire derives from this immense traffic. The discovery is of importance, that notwithstanding the convulsions by which the commercial world has been long agitated, the trade from the east to this country has flourished from year to year, and is still flourishing in an eminent degree, realizing every expectation held out on the establishment of the present system, and justifying the measures hitherto adopted for its extension. The progressive increase of the sales has been noticed at the proper times. The comparison of the sale in 1784-5, and by the last accounts, gives the most correct idea of the amazing improvement within that period. In 1784-5, the aggregate of the sales was £ 4,665,775 : in 1800-1, it was £ 10,393,452; which is an increase of £ 5,727,677. Lest it be objected, that the comparison is made on a period peculiarly favourable, I will take it on the average of the last three years. In this view, the sales amount to £ 10,275,439, exhibiting still an improvement of £ 5,669,664, which, in both cases, would have been yet more favourable, but for the operation of the act passed in 1799, respecting the customs, as already explained. Having given a cursory view of the very flattering situation of the affairs of the comp. both in their political and commercial relations, it yet remains to answer a question which must naturally arise;—From whence it results, that, in the midst of all this prosperity, the financial statements, for the two last years, have worn so unfavourable an aspect, with regard to India, as to disbursements and accumulation of debt? The very precise explanation given in each year on these points, will greatly lessen the difficulty of making the reply. I have, therefore, only to quote them in abstract. I must, however, take leave to offer one previous remark, that the comp. in their political capacity, are most peculiarly circumstanced. Possessed (as they truly are) of extensive dominions, enjoying, likewise, the advantage of beneficial alliances, yielding together immense resources, large and expensive establishments are required, not only for the administration of the govt, but likewise for the collection of the revenues, and particularly for the protection of their territories, and the fulfilment of their engagements with their allies. Under these circumstances, even in time of peace, the outgoing must be great: still a considerable surplus revenue would be left for remittance to this country, through the channel of investments, for the purposes prescribed in the agreement with the public. But in the time of war in India, particularly, where the expenses attending military operations are, beyond all proportion, greater than in this country, every financial disposition for peaceable times must necessarily be completely deranged, the demands upon the treasures must increase with the pressure of the times, while there is no possibility of procuring extraordinary aids, in any proportion to the exigencies of the govt. Thus circumstanced, no alternative remains, but having recourse to loans, either to supply the deficiency, or to prevent an interruption of the usual course of the investment. This measure, though affording relief for the moment, tends to add to the difficulties from the demand for interest. From this remark it will be inferred, that the war has been the chief

cause of the present situation of the comp.'s finances in India. This will be a kind of general answer to the question stated as likely to arise, but may not be quite sufficient; it is therefore necessary, to preserve an accordance with the comparative statement given of our advantages since the year 1784, to enter a little further into the particulars of the charges since that time, which will likewise give some satisfaction to another query, which will follow, of course, on the most essential parts of the financial system. If, after the general termination of hostilities, any hopes may be entertained, that substantial benefits will accrue from our increased dominions and extended trade, so that the financial embarrassments may be done away, and the advantages held out to the public may be realized? The expenses of the Indian establishments underwent a very narrow investigation immediately after the introduction of the present system, and every practicable reduction was made. Upon the breaking out of the war with Tippon, in the year 1790, and till the conclusion of it, the military charges were again greatly increased; but the sum received under the partition treaty, and the revenues of the countries ceded to the comp. may be looked upon as affording some relief in that case. The establishments were then again reduced within such limits as the circumstances of the time would admit. I will, therefore, take my retrospect from the year 1793, when, preparatory to the renewal of the charter, every source of revenue, and every item of charge, underwent, once more, a most narrow investigation, and an estimate was drawn up with every possible degree of accuracy, in order to ascertain what might be a proper arrangement between the public and the comp. in a time of peace. It would occupy too much time to enter into the detail of that arrangement, or of the estimate; I will only make such references to the estimate as may be required for the explanation of the general heads of charge. On the comparison of the estimate made in 1793, with that for the year 1800-1, now upon the table, the results are found to differ in a material amount; notwithstanding the resources in the latter period, from the increase of the old revenues, the additions of those from the conquered provinces, and the new subsidies, exceeded those of the former in upwards of three millions st. From the explanation of the detail of the accounts, the committee must be aware, that this apparently alarming difference arises from the enormous increase of the expenditure. This subject, in particular, has constantly occupied my most vigilant attention, and the court of directors have always enjoined the strictest economy; but from the very time when the estimate of 1793 was framed, such has been the state of affairs, that it cannot properly be taken as a criterion of expence. The war, and the engagements with our allies, have necessarily occasioned an immense addition to the military charges, which have likewise been greatly increased by the additional allowance to the officers, under the regulations of 1798, and by subsequent grants of increased pay to the private Europeans, and to the native officers and sepoy at Madras. In the civil branches of the administration, great changes have also taken place: liberal allowances have been granted to offices of high trust and responsibility; the revenue and judicial departments have been entirely separated: and it will appear, on a minute investigation of the increased charge, that the part of it which may be looked upon as permanent, is to be attributed either to circumstances connected with the addition to the resources, or to the absolute prescriptions of policy and justice.—A very considerable part of the charge estimated for 1800-1, may be looked upon as temporary. The additional interest on the debts will cease as they shall be discharged; and I look with earnest hope to the reduction of the great expence of field operations, which may reasonably be expected, from the general tranquillity which, before this time, has probably taken place, in every part of India. A further expectation may be entertained, that when peace shall generally take place, the necessity will no longer exist for military establishments so extensive as the present. Partial reductions have already been ordered; but when every practicable retrenchment shall be made in the expenditure abroad, and when that at home shall be relieved of the war contingencies, means will be found to recover the disorders in the financial system, and to put the comp. in possession of every advantage, commensurate with all the general improvements, in other respects, which have been stated to the committee.

My sentiments on the propriety of furnishing investments, by means of loans, have formerly been distinctly given: they are still the same. The measure was proper at the time, but by no means so for permanent practice; and although the same measure has been pursued in the last year, I should hope the very considerable supplies which have now for several years been furnished from the treasury in England, and which it appears the intention of the court to continue, will prevent the further accumulation of the Indian debt.—The general state of the comp.'s affairs, notwithstanding the increase of the expences, and the accumulation of the debts in India, may be found, upon calculation, to have greatly amended, within the periods of comparison. I have, upon a former occasion, brought to the notice of the committee, that the improvement under the operation of the present system, to the period of account then under consideration, was found to exceed eleven millions sterling: the alteration since, not having been to any great amount, the amelioration may, on the same principle, be now taken at about the like sum. The additional capital must, as then noticed, be taken into the account, and some further adjustments will be required. If such has been the event, under the circumstances of two wars in India, in part of the period; under the circumstance, likewise, of a general European war, from the year 1793; the inference is highly favourable to the mode of administration; and the more so, when the great additional revenue, and the complete conquest of every enemy in the East, are taken into the account.—The debts abroad are certainly much greater than at the first period of the comparison; but the assets exhibit an excess still more considerable. At home, the favourable alteration, in both respects, has been to such an amount, as to form, in some degree, the most serious part of the present financial embarrassment, inasmuch as what appears to be the chief cause of the apparent deterioration abroad, has contributed to the amelioration at home, to an extent rendering it a matter of great importance and some difficulty to restore the balance. This cannot be expected fully to take place till the return of peace. It had, however, been an object of very particular attention on my part; and from the confidence I have in the ability of the comp.'s resources, I was led to form an extensive plan, by which, upon calculations as accurate as can be expected upon mere estimate, the comp. would be enabled in a few years to restore the whole financial system to a state of the greatest prosperity; so that the debts in India would be discharged, the engagements to the public would be fulfilled, and the ultimate operation would be, the security of the full capital, at the end of the present charter.—I am fully aware, that in the judgment of some, my expectations will be pronounced too sanguine, and perhaps to be such, that their realization exceeds every degree of probability, or indeed possibility; as the rapid increase of the debt in the few last years, must offer an insuperable bar to the accomplishment of events so desirable as those now pointed out. This consideration, however, strengthens the ground of my proposition. If the loss of the surplus revenue operated so quickly in an unfavourable degree, sure the acquisition of revenue must be allowed to have an equal effect in the recovery of the system. Difficulties of a formidable nature, it must be admitted, will be in the way of the execution of a plan on so vast a scale. But these difficulties are only at the outset; once surmounted, no other obstruction need be apprehended, than such as no providence or care on our part can possibly meet; and I have no fear of hazarding my opinion, that should peace take place, and continue uninterrupted for a few years, and the trade remain in its present flourishing state, the realization of the whole of the advantages now stated may be safely reckoned upon, provided the principles upon which the calculations are made are regularly attended to.—

The grand and leading features of this plan are;

1st. An arrangement abroad, so that a full million from the surplus of the revenues shall, at the commencement, be applicable to the purchase of investments.

2dly. That the investments from India and China shall amount at prime-cost to four millions annually, in equal proportions.

3dly. That during the first four years from this time, the comp. shall avail themselves of the power they already have, under the act, for augmenting their capital stock to the extent of two millions, at the rate of half a million annually, which, it is supposed, will realize one million.

4thly. That the additional money, so raised, shall be applied exclusively to the liquidation of the present Indian debt at interest, either by increasing remittances in bullion or export to India to that amount, or by defraying additional bills drawn from India for the same purpose.

5thly. That the extinction of this debt now calculated to amount to fourteen millions sterling shall be carried on at the rate of one million annually, till the part of it termed the decennial loan, shall become payable, which is expected to take place on or about the year 1807-8; and that the sum then payable on account of Indian debt, which is stated at £3,500,000 shall be discharged in that year: on which suppositions the debts at interest abroad will then be reduced to £4,500,000, at which amount it may be thought expedient to keep them stationary.

The gradual reduction of the debt will add to the surplus of the revenues, by the diminution of the interest; and in the year 1808-9, the sum of two millions st. may be applied to the investments. The application of the surplus, thus increasing from year to year, will of course lessen the demand of India upon the home treasury, so that the balance of cash cannot fail of increasing to an immense amount.—I have stated the great difficulty to lie in the outset; my estimate is so calculated. In the first year, no surplus revenue is reckoned upon; the charges to be defrayed at home are all on a war estab.; the whole cost of the investment, four millions is to be paid, and another million to be applied to payment of the debts, making together 5 millions, in aid of India. This must be furnished in exports; by the payment of bills to be drawn from abroad; and in whatever amount these, together, shall be found deficient, bullion must be remitted. In the second year, a surplus is expected in India of one million, and the freight is taken at a peace rate, and so continued from year to year only lessening the amount to be paid at home on account of India, in proportion with the increase of the surplus from the revenues, as already mentioned. Ample allowance is made for the whole of the home charges in all the years; and if any unexpected charge should arise, the increasing balance of cash might be so employed, in the purchase of govt securities, or otherwise, as to establish a fund, fully sufficient to meet any peace contingency. The result of the data I have stated will appear, by a reference to the appendix, No. 26, 27, and 28 *. —If it be objected, that the trade is taken on too great a scale, which, according to present appearances, I cannot allow to be the fact: still, taking it at a less amount, say only three millions of investment, the operation would be highly favourable, though not to the extent at first stated: while the other effect would be, to render the plan more practicable, from the smaller demand on the home treasury for the prime-cost of the investments.

These propositions, it must be observed, do not arise from any new theory: they are simply upon the system I laid down in the year 1795, and are only an extension of that system. The expectations I then entertained were not wholly disappointed, and would have been most completely realized, but for the various events which have been brought to the notice of the committee. The difference between that time and the present is highly favourable to the success of the system I wish to adopt. There then existed every appearance of war with our European enemies, who held possessions in different parts of India; our most inveterate and formidable enemy, Tippoo, was still invested with considerable power:—We now reckon upon the prospect of peace, and have no immediate fear from any power in India.

The summary abstract of what I have now brought to the notice of the committee is as follows:—An examination of the accounts upon the table, both abroad and at home;—The influence and power of the comp. in the year 1784, and at the present time;—The acquisition of territory and state of alliances;—Of foreign relations;—The improvement of the internal administration of their own dominions;—Of the commerce in India, at China, and at home;—An explanation of the increase of the charges, and the prospect of again obtaining a surplus revenue;—The supplying investments by means of loans;—The improvement of the comp.'s affairs, under every event, during the periods of comparison;—And finally, the plan in contemplation on the return of peace.—In retiring from my official connection with the affairs of India, the committee will do me the justice to believe, that I can never be indifferent as to the success of the measures I have pointed out. I entertain on the subject the most sanguine expectations. Under other circumstances, I might, at the present moment, have felt deep regret, in the apprehension that new systems might have been introduced, and new theories applied to the administration of our Indian empire. I make no doubt, many things will be found to require improvement and correction, and none will rejoice more sincerely than I shall in the fame and glory of those who may be the instruments of those improvements. But I am perfectly satisfied, no radical change in the system I have pursued will be made, but on the fullest conviction of its propriety; and under that impression I shall continue to contemplate, with heartfelt joy, every progressive improvement in our Indian concerns; reposing the most entire confidence in the talents and integrity of those whom his majesty has appointed to succeed to me in this important charge. And it only remains for me to apologize to the committee, for engrossing so much of its time; and that the result of the examination of the statements may, as usual, be placed on the records of parliament, to move the following resolutions.

* These estimates are the same as are given in Mr. Dundas's letter of the 50th of June, No. 1, 2, & 3.

The Letters of Aristides on the Deposition of the Nabob of Arcot, the Death of the Deposed Nabob, and the late Revolution in the Carnatic.

[The Six following Letters originally appeared in the Morning Chronicle; as they are written with Ability, and throw a considerable Portion of Light on the Transactions alluded to in the preceding Papers, we have thought proper to preserve them.]

Nabob of the Carnatic.—Letter 1.—To John Wallace Esq. One of the Commissioners for the Affairs of India, &c.

Sir,—In tracing the transactions that have lately obtained in the Carnatic, by which a prince has been deposed and his dominions wrested from him; himself reduced to the situation of a subject, and one of his subjects raised to the dignity of a sovereign, it will not be a matter of surprise that I should address myself immediately to you. The spirited manner in which you advocated these transactions before the late house of commons, and the glowing enthusiasm with which you there pronounced an eulogium upon the noble lords at the heads of our affairs in India, give you a fair claim to my first regards. Allow me, however, to observe that, although your conduct on the occasion should be demonstrative of your zeal, and evince the warmth of your attachments, I doubt whether it will do much credit to your judgment, or permit even your partial friends to assist you at a future period, when the important question shall be fully discussed. I am free to confess that assertions are sometimes advanced, and professions made in parliament with as little consideration, and possibly with as little sincerity, as those that flow from the lips of certain candidates when addressing the multitude from the hustings at a general election, and notwithstanding men cannot be excused in either case, yet there is assuredly a vast difference between the one and the other. When a member of parliament rises in his place to speak upon a momentous subject with which the rights of humanity and the principles of justice are blended, and the honour and good faith of the nation are inseparably interwoven, he ought to reflect that he is standing before the great assembly of the people, bound by no common ties to exert himself to the utmost of his power to their benefit and advantage, unawed by fear, unbiassed by affection. You are yet a young man, and may plead the ardor of youth in extenuation of your precipitancy. Age will incline you to be less violent, and experience teach you to be more scrupulous when the measures of public men are impeached, and public investigation becomes the inevitable consequence. These observations, springing from sincere regard, are offered to your serious thoughts; for, believe me, there are few who wish you better than I do, and if early acquaintance can give a right to advise, I certainly am no trespasser upon your attention.—I think you said in the house, that the transactions to which I have reference “were agreeable to the most approved principles of the law of nations, and that the manner in which they had been conducted was consistent with the humanity and generosity of the Brit. character;” and I am satisfied that you spoke as you believed, but I am equally satisfied that your review of facts has been too rapid for the information of your judgment; and hence it is I am to presume that your premises have been mistaken, and your deductions erroneous. Without all the aids that you possess, yet with many others to which you have not had access, I have given more time to the examination of those transactions than probably you were able to detach for the purpose from your more pressing avocations, and the result has led to sentiments the very reverse of those that you seem to entertain. Having thus premised, I hasten to give a rapid sketch of the subject as it appears to my mind, divested of prejudice, and unshackled by partialities. “In all cases of disputed points between independent powers,” I quote from the highest authority, “neither party can erect itself into a judge of the conduct of the other party.” Now I take it for granted that Arcot was an independent power; but if the fact should be disputed, I will support it by recorded proofs of ancient and recent date, and the whole administration of India must subscribe to their authenticity. Yet the E. I. comp. who, I aver, recognised both the maxim and the proposition, as founded in certainty and in truth, did erect themselves into judges of the conduct of the late sovereign of Arcot, and in the exercise of their judicial functions did, as far as lay in their power, consign his memory to infamy, and adjudge that his country should become their own property.—Here I pause, undecided whether I ought in prudence to give the circumstances connected with this extraordinary tribunal, lest their novelty, and their rigour should operate to render them incredible. His highness was not accused during his life time, nor did his trial commence until he had ceased to exist! and afterwards, when one of the lords of his court, whose fidelity to his departed master reflects the greatest honour

upon himself, attempted the means of justifying his character, from a conviction of the rectitude by which his highness's actions had ever been regulated, the cold commissaries of govt, of whom I shall have abundant occasion to speak at a proper season, would not suffer him to proceed, and his benevolent purposes were in consequence defeated. In vain did this venerable nobleman, respectable for his great age, but more respectable for his numerous virtues, “repeat the reasonableness of entering into the defence of his sovereign,” at a melancholy moment when he could not defend himself. He was answered by those commissioners, that “the Brit. govt had numerous proofs that Omdut ul Omerah had violated his alliances, and being satisfied with their sufficiency, had no intention of constituting itself a judge of the conduct of its ally;” and then, with a frozen indifference that checks even in reflection, asked whether, “on the part of Ally Hussan,” for so they affected to call Tage ul Omerah, “he was disposed to an adjustment of the claims of the Brit. govt through the channel of an amicable negotiation;” in other words, to give up the whole of his dominions, and leave him dependant upon the liberality of the E. I. comp. You know such to be the case, and it is therefore unnecessary for me to dwell upon it. This brings me to a second feature of the transactions. When the comp. had determined on obtaining possession of the Carnatic, policy dictated that apparently amicable methods should be adopted in order to throw a veil over the iniquity of their measures, and give security to their objects when they should have been accomplished; and therefore, immediately upon the demise of his highness Omdut ul Omerah, they acknowledged his son, Tage ul Omerah, as his heir and successor, opened a negotiation with him as such, and treated with him as such for several days, in the view to “an adjustment of the claims of the Brit. govt,” and upon a promise of making him the nabob; but after they had thus committed themselves, and after they had been fully apprized that he had ascended the throne of his ancestors in hereditary right as the heir of his father, and as his successor appointed by his will, they suddenly broke off all conference and communication with him, declared him an enemy although he had never committed either hostility or crime, imprisoned him and his family, and proclaimed Azim ul Dowlah, who had no pretension to the situation of nabob of the Carnatic. The motive that influenced the latter proceedings have in attempt been variously accounted for; its abstract meaning is easily explained. Tage ul Omerah knew his own rights, and, contrary to the expectation of the govt of Madras, and notwithstanding the threats and menaces used to intimidate him, shewed a disposition to preserve them.—Azim ul Dowlah had no rights, and therefore readily acted as the govt dictated—he had nothing to lose and every thing to gain; he therefore ceded the Carnatic to the comp. that did not belong to him, and gained a throne that belonged to his sovereign.—Had Tage ul Omerah yielded to the peremptory demand of the govt of Madras and relinquished his rights, I speak advisedly, he would this day have been as much as Azim ul Dowlah now is, the reigning nabob, and the name of Azim ul Dowlah, who is emphatically designated by the govt of Madras “the favourite of fortune,” would never have been noticed nor even heard of. In the occurrence of events his situation is not much advanced by his elevation—a prince without a people, and a sovereign without a territory, the puppet of the comp. and the ridicule of mankind. On this brief statement the public will decide whether such transactions bear the legitimate relationship that you have ascribed to them, or whether they are not the offspring of tyranny and oppression, nurtured upon the spoils obtained by fraud and injustice, and in open hostility with EVERY principle of the law of nations. —In my next letter I shall go more into detail, and however painful the task may be to my own feelings, I pledge myself to the public to develope a scene of enormities long continued to be exhibited in Brit. India that will call forth their sympathy and commiseration, and excite their horror and indignation. I am no party man, nor am I propelled in my course by that impetus which owes its origin to a golden source. I espouse the cause of an injured prince and an illustrious family, plunged into indescribable miseries, and subjected to insults amidst their variegated distresses, as a public question of unequalled magnitude. ARISTIDES.

Letter II.—To John Wallace, Esq. one of the Commissioners for the Affairs of India, &c.

Sir,—In my last letter I spoke of the nabob of Arcot as an independent sovereign; that fact is now established, and therefore to adduce any further proof in support of it would be superfluous. If it were otherwise situated, an act that I am about to treat of would alone be demonstrative of independent sovereignty. I mean the treaty of 1792 made by the E. I. comp. with the nabob Wallagaw, an act by which the line of succession was guaranteed to his highness Umdat ul Omerah and his heirs and successors. In consequence of that guarantee Umdat ul Omerah, upon the demise of his father, Wallagaw, an event that took place in 1795, ascended the musnud, and dying himself in 1801, it became the right of his son, Tage ul Omerah, whose titles were fortified by the testamentary disposition of his father, who thereby declared him to be his successor and heir to all his property and possessions, both private and regal, but being then a minor, the provident author of his being, in anxious solicitude for his future welfare, appointed Nageb Khan and Tuke Ally Khan, men of high rank and universal acknowledged integrity, to be regents until he should become of age and capable of taking into his own hands the reins of govt. In this situation of affairs, if the govt. and council of Fort St. George were not to be prevailed upon by the common feelings of humanity to use the ample means within their power towards alleviating the sufferings of an afflicted family, they were, as the representatives of the E. I. comp. bound by the strongest ties to protect the young prince in the possession and enjoyment of the rights that had thus descended to him. But how adverse were their proceedings to the dictates of their duty! In the language of his highness, decent attentions had scarcely been paid to the inanimate form of his father to prepare it for its shroud, when commissaries, armed with the authority of that govt. entered the palace, not with a view to the discharge of those duties which the E. I. comp. had pledged themselves in the most solemn manner to perform, but in the contemplation of measures cold in their nature, unfeeling in their operation, and unjust in their objects; measures that outraged decorum, and added insult of grief. The prince was, at the time of their arrival, performing the last melancholy offices of filial piety near the hallowed repository that contained the remains of his beloved parent; regardless of those offices which bespoke indulgence and ought to have commanded respect, they required his immediate attention, and expected an implicit obedience. Nageb Khan, shocked at a requisition which purposed the violation of obsequies due to the departed, pleaded the recent death * of his master and friend, and the necessity of a sufficient interval for the observance of those rites that were called for by the mournful cause of them. The commissaries replied, that “the Brit. govt. were aware of the usage of Mahomedans in all cases of such nature, but that the affairs of a great govt. could not give way to the ordinary practices of individual families;” and the prince was necessitated to appear in their presence, to hear from them the foulest imputations they could possibly urge against the memories of his father and grandfather; and after having thus wounded his feelings they proceeded unmoved by any consideration for his tender years and deplorable situation, and unaffected by the surrounding scene of misery and distress, to demand of him the instant and unconditional surrender of his dominions, remarking that the E. I. comp. would consider of an estab. for his family and a suitable provision for the support of his own dignity. It is not for me to speak of the contending passions that agitated the bosom of his highness, thus inhumanly tortured, thus cruelly assailed; I leave them to the kindred sensibilities of a generous public. During this extraordinary conference, which professes to be the basis of an “amicable negotiation,” his highness summoned all the fortitude he possessed and so much required, and entering fully into the importance of the eventual crisis, debated in his own mind upon the dreadful consequences it connected, and, with a firmness that would have honoured riper years, gave his answer to those commissaries in a manner so mild and yet so dignified, as to extort even from them a tribute of momentary admiration, notwithstanding it baffled their expectations.

Although disappointed, the commissaries were not defeated; they had taken their measures upon the strong ground of arbitrary power, and holding in their hand “the sword, the most prominent and only essential mark of sovereignty,” † they were resolved on carrying them into execution, and this singular species of “amicable negotiation,” which on their part breathed nothing but enmity, spurning at every friendly proposition, continued for six or seven successive days. In the course of

* His highness's remains were then scarcely cold, he had ceased to breath only two or three hours.

† A sentiment that however incompatible with the feelings of Englishmen, and inconsistent with the principles of the Brit. constitution, was avowed by the court of Directors, and acted upon by their servants in India upon a former occasion, when they resolved to arrest from his highness the nabob of the Carnatic, that sovereignty which they had recently guaranteed to him by a treaty.

that period the prince had offered to surrender the better half of his possessions, both as to extent and revenue, persuading himself that such an instance of his friendship towards the E. I. comp. would conciliate their good opinion, and ensure to the early commencement of his reign all the succour it might stand in need of; but, to his highness's astonishment and mortification, the offer was refused with indignant contempt, accompanied with an assurance, that unless he gave up the whole, he must not cherish the hope of the comp.'s friendship and protection, and this assurance was conveyed in language so imperious and peremptory, and in a tone so decided and austere, as to convince his highness that any attempted modification, however favourable, would serve only to add to his disgrace, and swell the number of his insults. With no other prospect than splendid degradation or virtuous poverty, he had no alternative, and in adopting the line of conduct that he was to pursue, no hesitation. He had been taught from his infancy to revere and love the Brit. nation, and he determined to throw himself upon the Brit. justice, in fresh confidence of the utmost redress and every necessary support. An event, however, occurred that arrested his intentions: the ladies of the family who had never heard the voice of strangers, unless it were in compliment or kindness, and had ever been treated with refined delicacy, and all the tenderness of regard and affection, perceived themselves envied by European soldiery, whose unintelligible language produced the most alarming sensations; learning also that the government of fort St. George were hostilely disposed towards the prince, to whom they had offered every indignity, and were at the moment actually meditating the dissolution of his empire; and concluding that, if their sovereign could be degraded and dethroned, it was not for them to expect milder notice, their apprehensions caught the alarm, their fears became their guides, and they shuddered at the idea of polluted honour, which their overpowered minds imagined would be the certain consequence of the anarchy and confusion that prevailed. Under such impressions they communicated to the prince the horrors by which they were surrounded, and implored of him to relax in his purposes, and yield to the pressure of ruling circumstances. Touched by their sufferings, the prince acceded to their wishes, but the offer of further sacrifices was rejected with as little urbanity as had attended similar instances. "The requisition we make," said the commissaries, addressing themselves to the regents, "must positively be complied with; upon that depends his fate, either as the acknowledged nabob of the Carnatic, or a mere dependent of the comp." Najeeb Khan, whose affection for his prince, and whose esteem for the subjects of these realms have always been conspicuous in every action of this life, earnestly endeavoured to effect a just and friendly understanding between the parties, and declared that the prince, the family, and the regents themselves would do any thing within their power that reason could demand and honour sanction: that they all looked up to the British govt for protection, and that it was their interest and their duty to obtain the favour of the Brit. nation; but to give up the integrity of the Carnatic was a proposition calculated to frustrate the projected object of the arrangement, because, by such a procedure, the station of nabob of the Carnatic would be annihilated." The commissaries expressed themselves to be fixed in their determinations, and shortly after proceeded to pronounce his highness's sentence, in nearly the same terms that in a court of justice are adopted towards a convicted criminal: "You have determined the situation yourself in which you seek hereafter to be placed; that you will in future be a private person, hostile to the Brit. interests, and dependant upon the bounty of the comp." A negotiation now commenced with Azim ul Dowlah that terminated in a treaty, by which he surrendered the whole of the Carnatic and all its sovereign rights to the comp. for ever, they on their part agreeing to make him nabob, and take him under their protection. The preamble to the treaty is perfectly unique in the science of diplomatics, and will in all probability remain so. Independent of various inconsistencies it carries upon the face of it a contradiction in terms.

Previous to the execution of the treaty, the govt of fort St. George had affixed their seals upon every article contained in the public offices of the durbar, in which the records of the empire, and documents of every description were deposited, and upon the treasury, in which was only a small sum of money intended for the expences of the household. This done, an order was sent by a trooper to the prince, directing him to deliver the key of the futte chowkey, built by his father, and the place of his own residence, to the servants of Azim ul Dowlah; and another trooper arrived with an order for the keys of the apartments, inhabited by the principal ladies of the family. The khans reasoned with a gentleman holding high military rank, and in the command of the troops at the palace, upon the indecency and indignity offered by such a measure, and that the family would be disgraced and dishonoured by it—but obedience was insisted upon, and it was in vain to attempt any resistance. The prince, terrified at these proceedings, fled for security to the habitation of his mother, and thence sent two papers to the govt of fort St. George, the one of them offering certain stipulations, the other a carte blanche. Of these papers one was returned, and the other detained, but detained only until the next day, when it was also returned without a comment, and was followed by the commissaries of govt, who entered the palace without ceremony, and after having examined the hall of audience and other place, proceeded to the upper rooms, the doors of which led directly to those belonging to the apartments of the ladies, who were thrown into the greatest consternation by the approximation of such obtrusive visitors. At the instalment of Azim ul Dowlah, threats and promises were alternately employed with the public servants of his late highness to procure their attendance; and the songers, merchants, and others of Madras, the subjects of the E. I. comp. were solicited to be present. On that occasion the regents were doomed to undergo sufferings far more painful and distressing than any they had yet experienced. In violation of their well-known principles and sentiments, and in breach of the trust reposed in them, they were compelled to appear and do homage to a man whom they detested, as the usurper of the rights of a sovereign whom they loved, and whom they had only a few days before seen upon the throne of his ancestors, and in the pride of loyalty gladly hailed and acknowledged as their liege lord. Flushed with power, and profiting by example, Azim ul Dowlah, soon after his elevation, sent a guard of Scapoys to Tage ul Deen Khan, a youth who had married the daughter of his late highness, with orders to bring him into his presence. The guard found him at the door of his house, and there seizing him dragged him before the despot, where he was obliged to make his offerings of submission. I shall conclude this enumeration of unparalleled outrages with stating, that very soon after the transaction last mentioned, the regents and other Khans, and the approved servants of the prince, and who had been placed in attendance upon his person by his deceased parent, were commanded to retire to their own houses, and no more to come within the precincts of the palace, so that his highness was left a prisoner, without a person to perform even his menial offices, and his whole family were, at the same time, in like manner deprived of their liberty. I have been thus prolix in narrating this disgusting detail, in order that the observations I shall make upon the general conduct of the E. I. comp. towards their highnesses the nabobs Wallagaw and Omdut ul Omerah and their illustrious and unoffending family; and particularly as it relates to the deposition of his highness Tage ul Omerah, may be the more easily comprehended and correctly understood. Upon the very few points already embraced, I might with safety, as I certainly should with confidence, appeal to your own honourable feelings, how far the acts of govt in India, in the unhappy occurrences that every day become more interesting, and more the subject of public discussion, can be reconciled with the well-known humanity and generosity of the Brit. character. In matters of such high national importance it is due to the Brit. character, which surrounding nations have been accustomed to contemplate with wonder and admiration, to bring forward every information with which they are materially connected, to the end that the fact may be ascertained, and justice enabled to proceed in her due course. Such is my motive and such my object, and I trust that it will be in my power to manifest, not by indefinite assertion, but irrefragable proofs, that the highnesses the nabobs Wallagaw and Omdut ul Omerah died, as they had lived, our sincere friends and faithful allies, that their adherence to the good faith of treaties was exemplary, that their attachments to the Brit. nation were so powerfully cemented, that even the oppression and injustice of the E. I. comp. could not shake, or in the least diminish them; and that the correspondence, which in impotent attempts has been adduced as evidence of secret design to promote treacherous views, was selected by those who conducted the affairs of the comp. in this country and in India.

ARISTIDES.

Letter III.—John Roberts, Esq. Chairman of the Court of Directors.

Sir,—Considering you, as I really do, an honest man, firmly attached to the principles of our happy constitution, and cherishing that loyalty which is due to the best of sovereigns; entertaining an anxious concern for the prosperity of your country, and tenacious of its honour: alive to the charms of humanity, and eagerly desirous to aid the cause of justice, I shall entreat your attention to transactions that, in my mind, form a prominent feature of our govt in India; where the grand object has lately been, and continues to be, the acquisition of territory, an object to which the rights of sovereigns and subjects have been devoted, and the justice and good faith of the nation sacrificed. The E. I. comp. have by their late conquests, and by other means, become possessed of an empire that extends from the gulph of Cambay, on the Malabar coast, to the mouth of the Ganges in the bay of Bengal, whence it stretches westerly until it approaches the provinces of Tibet, Lahore, and Moultan; then returning in an opposite direction, it passes through Hindostan, and continues its course until it reaches the shores that are bounded by the Arabian sea, having on its southern confines, the numerous principalities that confine the Maratta states. When the account of those conquests and their connections were first contemplated, the ideas became confused by the various objects they presented, and the mind, dazzled by the brilliancy thrown round them by official narrative, was incapable of that discrimination which leads to accurate conclusions. Wonder and astonishment superseded investigation, and we were taught to admire that which we did not understand. Thus predisposed to credulity, it is not surprising that every credit was given to subsequent statements by the India govt. of the benefits that were to result from achievements of such magnitude, and so much grandeur; amongst these were enumerated the prodigious increase of revenue, and the addition of power, which from the extirpation of the sultan of Mysore, was declared to tower so high, that there was not left a force bold enough to provoke it, nor sufficient to disturb its progress. The fervor of the moment has at length subsided, and reason once more resumes her seat. Let us then examine dispassionately the propositions that these extraordinary occurrences have offered to our consideration; the importance they have raised, and the various rights they involve, press them forward to particular notice. To this end it will be requisite to take a cursory view of the native governments, by which our own are surrounded—their frontiers I have already delineated. Respecting those to the northward and westward, I shall say very little; our knowledge of them is extremely circumscribed, and I devoutly wish it may remain so. How far the system of measures pursued in the soubah of Oude may operate to defeat that wish, is a point that is of itself so demonstrative, as to remove the necessity of an opinion. Our ally there, a Mahomedan prince, has been divested of his possessions, that were his own of indefeasible right, and secured to him by the fences of an existing treaty; and he feels of course, as a sovereign ought to feel upon an event that has virtually driven him from his throne, and reduced him to a situation, little better than that of a subject, in his own dominions. In this revolution of things, many of the nobility of his highness's court and others, men of illustrious family, have lost the employments they held, and the consequence in which they had been accustomed to move; circumstances that must at least excite personal animosities, if they should not rouse them to open revenge, and if there be loyalty in the heart of an Asiatic, which cannot be denied, or even disputed, they will naturally sympathize in the sufferings of their prince, in whose misfortunes the

own originate, and become the implacable, although possibly the concealed enemies of the authors of both. If this melancholy picture be overcharged, the nature of man must be altered from what it was, and new and debased sentiments must occupy his bosom. With the Marattas we have had much intercourse, and it will be necessary to enlarge upon these subjects. They have occasionally been our confederates and our adversaries; in the one case they made their bargains before they would serve, and were afterwards remunerated for services which they never performed—in the other, devastation and ruin have marked their footsteps, and dismay and horror accompanied their pursuits. When led by Senerjee, not quite a century ago, they were so insignificant as to be almost concealed from notice by the obscurity in which they were immersed. Since that period they have multiplied so surprisingly, that belief might hesitate in giving credit to the fact; and at this time they are indisputably the most warlike and powerful people existing, or, it may be, that ever did exist, in India; nor has their power yet reached its summit, and their ambition, like their avarice, is boundless. Adopting the example of the western world, they have formed their infantry, once an armed rabble, into regular regiments, and, assisted by Europeans of all nations, have arrived at a degree of perfection in military knowledge and discipline that may challenge admiration, and will certainly compel respect. It is their cavalry, however, on which they place their chief dependance, and of these, it is said, they can bring two hundred thousand into the field. They are of a restless disposition, of an enterprising genius, soldiers from their infancy, and plunderers by profession. But they have another character not less deserving of remark, and which may have a preponderating weight in those councils that are to advise their future operations—they are the aborigines of the country, and consequently of the Hindoo religion, which rejects with abhorrence every proposal of conversion to its tenets: holds the habits and customs of Europeans and Mahomedans in equal detestation, as the effervescence of impunity, and execrates both as abominable for eating of the flesh of the cow, an animal of sacred estimation throughout Hindostan, so much so that to kill a cow is amongst the highest crimes that can be perpetrated. The Marattas, then, must be regarded as a component part of the great Hindoo body, and the whole, actuated by one feeling, governed by one principle, and animated by the same spirit towards the accomplishment of one purpose common to all. Hence it is apparent that the far greater number of the E. I. Comp.'s subjects may be friendly disposed towards the Maratta interest, which, in some of its aspects must be dear to them, united as they are by the bands of a religion that, more susceptible than the sensitive plant, shrinks even at the approach of the uninitiated; a religion mild and benign in its institutes, enshrined by impervious forms, that are encompassed by unconquered prejudices, and administered by priests who hold the mind of its followers in the adamantine chains of superstition. That our troops in India transcend all praise, and are equal to any service within the ability, zeal, and exertion of the bravest and best disciplined troops in the world to perform, is a truth to which I subscribe with pleasure and gratitude; but there are situations in which the efforts of valour would be of no avail, and discipline becomes useless. The Marattas can with the greatest ease pour into different parts of our possessions twenty or thirty thousand horse, and the utmost consternation and confusion would instantly ensue. The inhabitants of every denomination, now entirely exposed, and totally defenceless, would fly to the woods for safety, where those who should be successful, for numbers must be lost in the attempt, would behold their habitations in flames, all their immoveable property destroyed, and their cattle, the bulk of their fortune, swept away by the invaders. Thus would the revenues of the public be suspended, its resources cut up by the roots, and a successful war carried on against us without the necessity of firing a shot. What could our troops do with such an enemy, whose motions are as vivid as lightning? Let it also be considered that those troops are to garrison countless forts, that are dispersed at the distance of 10, 20, 30, and so on, to 500 miles from each other. If, thus circumstanced, it should be deemed expedient to carry hostility into the enemy's country, it would require much time to assemble an army, during which a thousand embarrassing and ruinous occurrences might take place; but suppose the army assembled and arrived in the Maratta's dominions, would victory be within their grasp? Certainly not. They would find there a continuation of stupendous mountains, surrounded by impregnable forests, and the labyrinth by which these are accessible to the natives unknown to foreigners, and if we were acquainted with them, we should not be benefited by our knowledge. Where troops would be necessitated to march in single ranks through passes and defiles, thickly planted on each side by unseen assailants, in order to reach their destined spot, courage itself would stand appalled, or its exertions would be spent in vain. To these mountains and forests, which form at once their refuge and their treasury, their granaries and their arsenals, the Marattas retreat whenever they are overpowered, or find themselves inferior to a contest on the plain—there they smile at their pursuers and defy pursuit. To shut them up in these fortresses of nature, nearly one thousand miles in extent, and their rear completely open, would be impossible, and to fall back from such a position truly dangerous. The predicament of the army under Gen. Goddard, in the year 1780, to which I refer you, will fully illustrate this fact, and the expences of that army may afford an useful lesson. Tipoo was the determined foe of the Marattas, whose growing power he saw and dreaded. His territories lay between theirs and those of the E. I. comp.; so that they could not have entered the one without having first subjugated the other; but in an evil hour this strong barrier was broken down, and the Marattas are become our immediate neighbours. It may be urged, that putting an end to a reign of usurpation, as the dynasty of Hyder has been called, must be highly gratifying to the Marattas, and I do not mean to deny it. But why are they gratified? Merely because a govt has been annihilated, which, under the rule of a man whom they feared and hated, impeded their views, and checked their inordinate ambition; and because it is now directed by a prince

whose religious tenets, and native predilections may incline him to favour them; but if they should have nothing to hope from his assistance, they will have nothing to fear from his enmity. Here then are the effects of our wisdom and policy. The Hindoo influence, already gigantic, has been extended, and the Mahomedan interest, that has been rapidly declining for many years, has been lessened. The Hindoos are computed at forty millions, and the Mahomedans, who are scattered over the face of Hindostan, do not exceed four millions. The Hindoos were since made tributaries to the Mahomedans, at an era when the one lived in all the simplicity of the primitive ages, and the other had been trained to arms, and inured to all the hardships of war. Their respective situations have undergone great changes, and the one is known to be as expert in the field as the other. But although the Hindoos submitted to the Mahomedans, they never lost sight of their former state; nor did they ever cease to cherish the hope of returning to it. They may now indulge that hope amidst more flattering prospects opened to them by means not within their power to have commanded. Their dormant spirit may now awaken, and who will say that it may not be roused to action? It is with nations as with individuals, when deprived of their dignity and honour, and reduced by injustice and oppression to humiliation and poverty, they will look forward to favourable seasons, and with avidity seize on the opportunity that may restore them to their lost rights and most valued privileges. The conquest then of Mysore, if I am correct in my premises, instead of strengthening the power of the E. I. comp. has very much weakened it, by weakening its defences, and the debility has been increased, by raising to the musnud of that kingdom the reputed descendant of a prince also of aboriginal extraction, and of the Hindoo religion; and if your plans of conquest have on the one hand served only to introduce dangers, and open a wide field for disputes and controversies, which may be calculated upon as endless, it will not be less evident that they have failed in their purpose of advancing your revenue, which I shall hereafter endeavour to prove. But it will be of infinitely more importance to the public to know the means by which such ends were acquired. In those their stake has been great and their loss immense—fortunately they can and will retrieve it.

Letter II.—To John Walker, Esq. One of the Commissioners for the Affairs of India, on the Report of the Death of the dewan N. nabob.

SIR—A report that has been some time in circulation of a nature much to be deprecated obliges me for a moment to deviate from those objects to which I had by my former letter called your attention. It has been stated in several of the daily prints, and particularly The Times, that accounts received from Madras mention the death of his highness the deposed nabob of the Carnatic. How far that statement, which concludes with a confidence that gives to it the colouring of certainty, is entitled to the credit that it claims, you best can determine, as your official situation must be informed upon a matter of so much importance; and relying upon your candour I persuade myself that you will feel a particular gratification in relieving, by such means as you may deem best calculated for the purpose, the painful doubt and anxious suspense it has produced in the mind of the country. To solicit the comp. upon the subject would be an unprofitable undertaking. Elevated by the pride of power, surrounded by the attributes of majesty, and exercising all the functions of royalty, they seem to have considered upon all occasions that a communication to the public of their Asiatic transactions would be a condescension incompatible with their pre-eminence, and derogatory to their dignity; yet surely they are not to learn at this day, that although sovereigns in India, they are subjects in England, and that they owe a larger debt of duty and of gratitude to the public than any individual or body of men in the kingdom: that whatever may be the privileges they enjoy under the charter they hold, every act of their government is amenable to the laws of the land, and that a violation of those laws will work a forfeiture of that charter. And if the report alluded to be true, it may be advisable that they should pay an early attention to the consequences that must follow upon a disclosure of the circumstances with which the event it announces is connected. It has been asserted from various quarters, and I maintain the fact to be so, that immediately subsequent to the deposition of his highness, he was not only condemned to be "a private person, hostile to the Brit. interests, and dependent upon the bounty of the comp." but in aggravation of this sentence, remarkable for the despotism by which it was dictated, and the absurdities that pervade it, his highness was also deprived of his liberty, and confined to an obscure apartment of the palace in which the usurper of his throne resided, and ruled with arbitrary sway, and as it has not been even suggested that his highness was afterwards restored to liberty, or removed to any other situation, we have a right to presume that he died in his prison, and that to the latest moment of his existence, he continued to be within the power of that man in whose sight he was odious and detestable; who, adopting the pernicious councils of envy and jealousy, and bending to the grovelling sentiments of hatred and malice, greedily anticipated the death of his highness as an occurrence that would dispel all those fears and apprehensions that beset his new-fangled greatness, and secure him in the possession of his ill-acquired diadem. Contemplating this assemblage, the tendency to which it pointed, and the passions by which it was influenced, are you not satisfied that it offers ample ground for the strongest suspicions, that his highness's death did not proceed from that course of visitation to which our nature is subjected? But, sir, there are other facts that speak with more positive decision, and demand the awful decrees of retributive justice. The unhappy prince, whose only crime was possessing a judgment beyond the common attainment of his infant years; a fortitude that rose to heroism, and a soul that united with filial affection those generous feelings that ennoble man and endear him to his fellow creatures, very soon perceived that his life, which was delivered into the hands of the tyrant, was in imminent danger of falling a sacrifice to his machinations. At the dead hour of night, a season best suited to dark designs, a band of ruffians, headed by Azim ul Dowlah, forced his dreary abode, with the impious view of making it his tomb; but, eluding the malevolent purposes of such atrocious intentions, his highness fled to the mournful dwelling of his distracted mother, and the fury of "the favourite of fortune" was for that time spent in excesses of cruelty upon a child of 7 or 8 years of age, who had accompanied his uncle, the venerable Najeb Khan, to the solitude of their sovereign, with the pious resolution of lessening his misfortunes by becoming the partners of them. Thus attacked in a spot which was considered as a sanctuary, consecrated to grief and affliction, his highness looked upon his fate as irrevocably fixed, and that the period for his departure to another world was fast approaching; a feeble ray of hope, however, threw a glimmering of light upon his gloomy prospects, and he conceived the determination to address the gov't of Port St. George, complaining of the outrage that had been committed, and craving protection against future violence. His illustrious family, whose sufferings were equally severe and oppressive as his own, joined him in the application, but the answer it obtained, far from diminishing their sorrows, marked out for them new and more distressing channels, and they saw themselves abandoned to despair. They were charged with inveterate enmity towards Azim ul Dowlah, because they were absent when he was enthroned, and had withheld the obedience that was due to his authority as nabob of the Carnatic! Much praise was bestowed upon the manner in which Azim ul Dowlah had deported himself, and it was signified in terms not to be mistaken, that his conduct towards them was justifiable upon the principle of retaliation. On the subject of the imprisonment of their persons and the plunder of their property, adverted to by them in their address, they were left to conclude from the premises afforded to them, that such acts were a part of the prerogative to which Azim ul Dowlah had succeeded, and that gov't were determined to guard and protect him in all his rights with honour and respect. This merciless answer finished with an intimation, that if Azim ul Dowlah, in the exercise of his authority, acted inconsistent with the honour and dignity of the English nation, he would be discountenanced, and that an inquiry would be made of him as to the measures of oppression that had been imputed to him. If these facts should be susceptible of proof, and if it should be manifested that the supplication of a dethroned sovereign and a royal family, reduced to wretchedness by the arm of power, had been offered to a Brit. gov't for an asylum against insult, and to obtain security for personal safety, and was received with indifference, or noticed only in order to convey reproach, will you preserve your tranquillity? will you experience no impulse of indignation? will you persevere in defending the gov't of India? I think too highly of your heart and understanding to believe it possible. The subjoined correspondence will illustrate the subject on which I have touched, and furnish the evidence that is necessary to support it. I know the emotions that it will excite in the public breast, and I leave it with every grateful sensation to the guardianship of the public feeling.

*Translation of a Letter to the Right Hon. Lord Clive, Governor in Council, &c. &c.
(From the Princess and Princesses of the Royal Family of Wallajeh and Oodit ul Omrah.)*

My Ld, We had the honour of addressing your Ldp in council on the 13th of Rajah, on the subject of our unhappy situation; but we have not yet been favoured with your Ldp's reply. Circumstances will not allow us to remain inactive in seeking our safety; and these must excuse any seeming impotency in requesting your Ldp's instant attention to our case. We shall not repeat to you Ldp in council the aggravated injuries which we publicly represented in our former letter, and we hope they are not forgotten; and although they have hitherto received no redress, we cannot bring ourselves to think that they will be ultimately unheeded. We have too high an opinion of your Ldp's character, and those honourable men who are your Ldp's council, ever to suppose that the indignities and cruelties which we stated to your Ldp would pass, after our solemn representation, without inquiry or remedy. Since we last had the honour of addressing your Ldp in council, our state has become more intolerable and more alarming. In a condition of imprisonment (and reverse of our former fortune)—a condition which would awaken humanity in every civilized breast, we have been loaded with opprobrium and insult, more severe and more galling than the heaviest fetters which ingenious barbarity could forge. Weak, forlorn, incapable of offence, and sacred as it were from circumstance, we have been offended and attacked both in person and in property. The doors of some of our dwellings have been forced, and our interior apartments have been entered and profaned by a hired band, without a semblance of reason, and without a shadow of cause, which justice, or even policy, can avow and authorize. The house of the prince, the heir of our late much regretted brother and sovereign, has been violently and forcibly broken; the doors torn from their hinges; his cabinets plundered; his friends calumniated and reviled; his attendants beaten; and he himself driven before a scoffing horde of ruffians (for we cannot dignify them with the name of soldiers) into the sanctuary of the Mulla, in the defence of what is dearer than life—his honour and his name. We need not declare to your Ldp in council the author of those injuries, nor need we represent the events to which they lead, and to which they are so fast approaching. They are too inevitable, and too plain to escape the most common capacity and judgment. We think it a duty we owe to our rightful prince, to our families, and to ourselves, to make known these circumstances to your Ldp in council, under a full conviction, that in regard to the calls of justice and humanity—to your own honour—to the character of the Brit. nation—and to the interest which your Ldp represents, you will interpose your immediate authority to restrain proceedings which outrage every principle of right, and the best impressions of our nature. We request your Ldp's most serious attention to the matters, of which we have now, and before apprised your Ldp in council; and if it shall be deemed expedient, from public motives; if your Ldp in council is liable to decide, to subject the prince and us to a temporary confinement, we hope that the horrors of it may be abated, inasmuch as it shall be consistent with the object which renders such a measure necessary. We must entreat most earnestly, that under the supposed necessity of such a measure, we may not be left under the guardianship of one who has a decided interest in our destruction, and whose daily acts, we are concerned to see and apprehend, have a direct tendency to that end. If we are to be considered as prisoners, let your ldp's justice allow us the common privilege of prisoners—safety. Take us from the precinct of Chepauk, and keep us within the custody of the comp.; permit us any pittance which may minister to our wants; but do not suffer us to remain within the grasp and terror of a power that knows no bounds, and acknowledges no laws, and whose acts receive a countenance and encouragement from surrounding soldiers, wearing the uniform of his majesty the king of Gt Brit. and the comp. What need we say more?

Chipok, Dec. 13, 1801.

Translation of a Letter from the exalted and high-titled Edward Lord Clive, addressed to some of the most respectable Personages connected with the Families of Arcot and Wallajah.

I have recently had the honour of receiving two letters, sealed by some of the principal men of rank belonging to the noble and dignified families of the nabob (the repository of forgiveness) Mahomed Ally Khan and the nabob (the asylum of mercy) Omdut ul Omrah Bahauder, and have fully understood their contents. It cannot be unknown to those noble persons that the English govt (consistent and suitable with the dignity of its intentions, and the justice and equanimity of its protection, so natural to, and inseparable from, that celebrated people) in the support of just and well-founded claims have been observant of the path of rectitude and moderation, which, by reason of the disaffection of the two before-mentioned princes, namely, Wallajah and Omdut ul Omrah, has become the more incumbent on the hon. comp. to attend to. Hence have proceeded the just and equitable intentions before mentioned, not from any concealed motives of obligation towards the families of the two before-mentioned deceased princes, but merely in regard to the old and long-continued friendly intercourse with those princes, and from the honourable and laudable desires of the above-mentioned govt, to establish and perpetuate the ancient honour and dignity of those families in all parts, and amongst all the princes of Hindostan, in pursuance of such their temperate exercise of authority. The Eng. govt might have entertained a well-founded hope that the regulations designed and finally established for the maintenance and prosperity of the Eng. nation in the Carnatic, and in preserving the honour of those noble families, would have been received with the sincere and united approbation of every individual personage of the above-mentioned families; it is nevertheless completely evident that those persons whose seals are affixed to the aforesaid writings have manifested every possible and unreasonable opposition to the before-mentioned regulations; and the greater part of them have endeavoured also to promote their several distinct claims; hence they have proved that any arrangement or mode that could have been adopted would be unsatisfactory. Finally, therefore, when the English govt resolved to exalt the nabob Azcem ul Dowlah (whom God preserve!) to the chiefship of the Carnatic, a reasonable hope prevailed in my mind that, after the rejection of those different claims, the noble persons of those families would assuredly have been anxious in desiring to signify their sincere and grateful compliance with, and approbation of a measure adopted merely for the exaltation and advancement of the dignity of that noble family. Wherefore, and agreeable to the before-mentioned considerations, by my authority, and in the name of the Eng. govt, at the proper season I caused to be published to those persons of quality the resolutions which the before-mentioned govt had formed of investing the nabob Azcem ul Dowlah (whose life may God prolong!) with the sovereign authority, and requested they would be ready in the presence at the time of seating the nabob Azcem ul Dowlah on the throne, by which attendance they would be honoured and advantaged. But it is fully known to those persons, and indeed public to all the world, that, at the time of entroning the favourite of fortune, of all those persons not even one was present, and from this circumstance there is the clearest proof of the most inveterate enmity of those persons towards the nabob Azcem ul Dowlah (may whose soul endure for ever!) and the most unbecoming contempt of the authority of the Eng. govt; and the decided disobedience of those persons with the most pernicious designs (and which can only tend to injure the claims of their own families) have been also rendered most unquestionably evident. In pursuance of this public avowal of enmity and disaffection to the nabob Azcem ul Dowlah (whose life may God lengthen!) they have unceasingly manifested their opposition to his endeavours and my admonitions, which have proceeded from the sole motives of increasing and cementing friendship and good understanding on all sides. From the commencement of these improper disputes, I have observed with much anxiety of mind their gradual advancement and increase, and in this view my respectful exhortations were contained in a letter, written on the 11th of the month of Jemmad ul Awall, in the year of the Hegr 1216, addressed to the sultaun Ulmissah Begum, and which was designed for the purpose of exciting content and good will

* It has been customary in addressing the native princes to write in the Persian language, and to accompany such letter by a translation in English.

amongst the several individuals of those families with each other; but this also has passed without any good effect, and disappointment upon disappointment has but increased. On observing so clearly these measures of opposition and indignity towards the authority of the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah (whom God prosper!) it must be acknowledged that, if the nabob before mentioned had entertained in his heart a similar degree of intolerance towards those persons who have so conspicuously avowed their most cordial animosity towards him, it would not have been extremely unnatural. It is, however, incumbent upon me expressly to declare, that the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder has at all times afforded to my mind the most complete and satisfactory proofs of his willingness to renew the terms of friendship and affection with every individual of the families to which he is related. Those persons of rank before mentioned, whose seals are impressed upon the aforesaid writings, have complained through me to the Eng. govt of the violence and oppression of the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah, in the imprisonment of their persons, and the plunder of their property, when the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah Behauder ascended the throne of the Carnatic, to succeed to the rights of his ancestors and noble forefathers, namely the preceding princes of the Carnatic. In like manner the rights before mentioned are, and have been for a length of time, under the superintending care and direction of the Eng. govt; and it is well known to every individual of those families that the Eng. govt have not interfered with the order and arrangement of the affairs of those defunct princes, otherwise than in the way of friendship. If there was any one time more than another that particularly required the interposition of the Eng. govt, it was on the occurrence of the death of the nabob Ameur ul Omrah. Nevertheless, to some of those noble persons before-mentioned it is known extremely well what the deceased nabob Wallajah did on the occasion of the before-mentioned event, in the express exercise of his own authority, conformable to the Mussulman (or Mahometan) customs, without any consideration of his existing agreements with the Eng. govt*, and the existing agreements moreover of that time accord with the present agreements of the new treaty, by means of which the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah has himself effectuated a renewal of the basis of friendly intercourse with the Eng. nation, and of the aggrandizement of his own family. It is proper, therefore, that the Eng. govt should consider as secured the rights stipulated for in the before-mentioned treaty, and it is certainly the most proper for me to be careful to reject every objection to the rights before-mentioned, and to resist any violation of the articles of agreement, which are now firmly established and consented to. Under this consideration, therefore, I declare the fixed resolutions of the Eng. govt to guard and protect the rights of the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah, according to the terms of the before-mentioned treaty, with honour and respect; and in like manner I promise, that at all times, the supporters of the authority of the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah will controul that authority, whensoever it may be found, that the exercise of it is inconsistent with, and repugnant to the honour and dignity of the Eng. nation; it will, therefore, be unquestionably necessary, if the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah should really act towards the protectors of his authority, in the manner and to the extent as stated in the forementioned writings, that in that case I should discontinue such mode of acting, and finally put a stop to such conduct—a species of authority nevertheless so entirely subversive of the care and prudence of the Eng. nation, and so incompatible with any permanent intercourse and friendship between the several persons of rank of the palace of Chepauz, that its existence can scarce be imagined.—It is also well known to me, that some of the circumstances stated in the writings beforementioned have been chiefly fermented and stirred up with much exaggeration by the excess of anger and ill will; but, notwithstanding this impression upon my mind, without neglecting the interposition of friendship, I will enquire into from the nabob Azeem ul Dowlah and investigate those oppressive measures, as set forth in the aforesaid writings; and, as soon as I have obtained a clear explanation, I will again write to those noble persons who have put their seals to the above-mentioned writings.—Every reparation consistent with the observance of the real good faith of the Eng. nation will be made:—What further is necessary to be said?

Written on the 11th of the month Shabaun, in the year of the Hegira 1216—corresponding with the 18th of December, in the year of Christ 1801.

Letter V.—To the Editor of the Morning Chronicle.

Sir,—A letter in the Times of the 11th instant, signed Zeno, has given to me principles which I trust do not belong to me, and endeavoured, by general assertions, to injure the cause that I have espoused. God forbid that I should entertain a thought injurious to virtuous achievements, or attempt to sully an honourable act in which the public may have an interest. The man who might be wicked enough to pursue such conduct would soon meet the punishment due to its atrocity. Zeno ought to have known, that before the public form an opinion upon subjects of considerable magnitude that are submitted to their decision, they will require circumstantial details, supported by the evidence of ineluctable facts. If then, I should fortunately draw down their resentment upon the measures that I expose, there can be no foundation for the apprehension that exalted worth will sustain an injury, or that deserving merit may be deprived of its well entitled rewards. Zeno's propositions sufficiently evince that he "has but little knowledge of India's affairs;" there was no occasion for a formal declaration of his ignorance. If he will take the trouble to turn over the page of Asiatic History, defective as it certainly is, he may notwithstanding perceive, that the greater number of the Indian princes hold their territories in right of hereditary descent, and of course these cannot be denominated usurpers. There are others who have acquired dominion by conquest, and if such means be questionable, there are very powerful reasons why Zeno should not court enquiry. I abhor usurpation as much as he does, but I know not of any other usurpers in Hindoostan than those whom he so strenuously defends. His ethics seem

* This alludes to the conduct of the nabob Wallajah, in seizing upon the estate and possessions of his son the Ameër, shortly after his decease: but it must be remembered that the Ameër died without making any will or disposition of his property, which in consequence became the right of the reigning sovereign, according to the Mahomedan customs.

worthy of the proceedings that are honoured with his approbation, and may by and by be adopted by his friends in theory; they have already carried them into practice. I can, however, assure him that it will be a mournful day to the British interests when the Mahomedan influence shall cease to exist. On his political arguments I have only one observation. If a legitimate power enters into engagements with an usurper, the legality of the one cannot but be acknowledged by the other, as must first rest upon the footing of equality; and if that, as it should be urged that those engagements have been violated, Zeno will surely allow that the party accused should be heard before he was condemned, and that the accuser ought not to be at liberty to try the cause, the jury to pronounce the verdict, and the only one to be benefited by the time so extracted in consequence; and it be allows this, which the law of nations and the municipal laws of every civilized state hold to be just and indispensably requisite, he will allow almost all that I am contending for. The nabob of Arcot was no usurper, although Zeno does not appear to be acquainted with that fact. He was our friend, shared in our adversity, and on the hostile field fought and bled with us, and when properly bound upon our arms, he glories in our successes, which was all the share that was permitted to him in their result. He was our most ancient and, as I will at a proper time demonstrate, our most faithful ally; and he subsidized our troops, the only military force in his country. Yet the E. I. Comp. who preferred no charge in the life time of his highness, condemned him after his decease, and seized upon his dominions, which they pretended had become forfeited by his crimes!!! I shall not discuss with Zeno the conduct of the E. I. comp. towards the native princes; he will soon enough perceive the fallacy of all his assertions, and that the information upon which he has taken up his pen, has been an imposition upon his understanding. — For the sake of humanity, and for other considerations equally interesting, I sincerely wish that I could accede to the friendly sentiments which, as Zeno says the E. I. comp. have always manifested towards the nabobs of Arcot. With more consistency, and certainly with more justice than attaches to his questions and answers, I might go on thus: Did not the E. I. comp. frequently violate their treaty with these nabobs, who patiently bore the injury, soliciting only as a favour, that redress which they were warranted to demand as a right? Yes. Did they not often trespass upon the rights of these nabobs, and in some instances actually subvert their authority and establish their own in its stead, in the breach of an existing treaty? I answer, yes; and I deny the E. I. Comp. to contradict me. I have not taken up the subject without the deepest impression of its importance, nor shall I at any time treat it with that levity with which others may have trampled upon all laws, and spurned every principle of justice. Appearing as I do before the august tribunal of a generous public, I feel that awful respect which the situation naturally inspires, and I would not intentionally venture even a surmise that liberality might not sanction, and candour approve. I admit that, upon the demise of his highness the nabob Omdut ul Omerah, the comp. offered the empty throne to his son, Tage ul Omerah; and without dwelling upon the absurdity of their making an offer to a sovereign prince of the dignity to which he was indisputably entitled, I will state the conditions that accompanied this generous and liberal offer—that he should give up to them the whole of his territorial possessions, trust to their benevolence for his subsistence, and brand the name of his ancestors with infamy!!! And if Zeno will consult the papers to which he refers me, he will find that Tage ul Omerah actually proposed to relinquish to the comp. those districts that were mentioned in the treaty as security for the subsidy it had provided for, and that they rejected the proposal with contempt; and he will also find, through the same medium, that every fort in the Carnatic, has for these twenty years, been garrisoned by the troops of the comp. — Zeno asks who I am: I can assure him that I am no hireling; that my circumstances place me above mercenary pursuits; and that I am sincerely attached to my country, to whose best interest my feeble labours are directed. In point of rank, I class with the humblest of his majesty's subjects; but I soar amongst the proudest in my zeal for my king, whom I love with the fervor that I adore my God. I do not ask who Zeno is: he supposes that his appeal, which is dignified and polished, will be heard, and that mine, which is simple and rude, will be rejected; I know enough of him, then, to be convinced that he has a very great advantage over me, and I do not envy him in the possession of it; I confess that my language is not elegant, but it is the language of truth, and that is sufficient to my purpose, and if it should be vulgar, in the literary meaning of the word, I hope it will not offend in the common acceptance of it.—I am more obliged to Zeno for his introduction of the letter dated the 30th of Jan. 1775, than those will be for whose advantage he was induced to bring it forward. Upon reflection it will appear to himself very extraordinary that a letter which seems to carry so much weight into the charge of criminal correspondence, which the comp. are so anxious to establish against the nabobs of the Carnatic, should not have been particularly noticed, or even glanced at by the gov. gen. of Bengal and the gov. of Madras in the proclamations and other declarations, that they have published to evidence the justice and necessity of the measures they have enforced, and the revolution they have effected against the sacred rights of those princes. A late chairman of the court of Directors may be able to furnish him with a complete explanation; it will be my duty to explain it to the public, accompanied with other truths, necessary to the knowledge of the state. The assemblage will form a lasting monument to the honour and fidelity of their highnesses, and of their friendship and affection towards the Brit. nation, and overwhelm their enemies with shame and confusion. I have paid this attention to Zeno; but I shall not again suffer myself to be diverted from more solemn objects: I am armed with proofs that would make a convert even of him, and warn him into an enthusiastic opposition of these principles which he now so ardently maintains. I trust that I shall not have occasion to employ them.

ARISTIDES.

Letter VI.—To the Editor of the Morning Chronicle.

Sir,—In reference to the late revolution in the Carnatic, which if not more unjust in its principle, was certainly more outrageous in its means than any thing that has yet appeared in Switzerland, it is said by those who know, or ought to have known better, that upon the demise of the late nabob Umdut ul Omerah, the musnud passed from the family, conformably to the firmand of the emperor of Delhi, under which they held it: that the comp. were the representatives of his imperial majesty, and that, as such, were justified in taking into their own hands the govt of those dominions that had thus reverted to him. To refute such fallacies which have made the desired impression even upon intelligent minds, I have subjoined an article of a treaty, executed on the 23d of Feb. 1768, between the comp. and the nabob Mahomed Ally, on the one part, and the soubah of the Decan on the other part, and I imagine that the evidence it affords will be conclusive.

ARISTIDES.

Art. VII. The exalted and illustrious Shaw Alam, having been pleased, out of his great favour and high esteem for the nabob Wallajaw, to give and grant to him and his eldest son, Myen ul Malk Umdut ul Omerah, and their heirs for EVER, the government of the Carnatic, Payen

Gaut, and the countries dependent thereon, by his royal firmand, bearing date the 26th of August, 1765, or the 27th of the moon Zaphur, in 6th year of the said emperor's reign: and the nabob Asaph Jaw Nizam ul Mulk, &c. having also out of affection and regard for the said nabob Wallajaw released him, his son Myen ul Mulk, &c. and their heirs in succession for ever, from all dependence upon the Decan, and giving him a full discharge of all demands, past, present, and to come, on the said Carnatic, Payen Gaut, by a sunud under his hand and seal, dated the 12th of November, 1765, in consideration of the said nabob Wallajaw having paid the soubah five lacks of rupees, it is now agreed and acknowledged by the said Asaph Jaw Nizam ul Mulk, that the said nabob Wallajaw, and after him his son Myen ul Mulk, and their heirs in succession, shall enjoy for ever as an ulamgan, or free gift, the govt of the Carnatic, Payen Gaut, in the fullest and amplest manner.

JURIDICAL PROCEEDINGS.

KING'S BENCH.—BEFORE LORD ELLENBOROUGH.

Parry v. Morris.

June 5.—The plaintiff and defendant are potters, and manufacturers of sugar moulds. This action was brought to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff, by reason of the defendant's having enticed a person of the name of Deal out of the service of the plaintiff, after he had commenced, and before he had finished a piece of work for him, and harbouring that person, by employing him in his, the defendant's service, after notice that he had quitted the plaintiff's service, and left his work unfinished. The law of this case is clearly laid down in 6 Term Rep. 221, by which it is stated, "that an action will lie for receiving, or continuing in employment, the servant of another, after notice that he is that servant: that a person who contracts with another to do any piece of work for him, is the servant of that other, until that work is finished, and therefore no one else has a right to employ him until such work is finished." The circumstances of this case were these: Deal, the labourer, had worked for the plaintiff several years. In July last he had a piece of work on hand, and left his master, when there were about eight days labour remaining to finish it. He went to the defendant, who hired him. The plaintiff sent to the defendant a letter, saying, "I beg leave to acquaint you, that W. Deal, whom you have in your employment as a potter, is engaged at my manufactory to work, which work he has left unfinished; and I trust, after this notice, that you, as a tradesman, will not detain or harbour him; if you do, I shall be under the necessity of commencing an action against you. Isaac Parry."—The defendant told the bearer of the letter, that he, the defendant, had had nothing to do in the law a great while; that he should like to have a touch at it; that if Deal owed Mr. Parry any money, he would pay it." The messenger said, "it was not the money that the plaintiff wanted, but the labour of the man who had left his service." The defendant replied, "You may tell Mr. Parry that I have as many bricks to give to the lawyers as he has moulds." He kept Deal in his employment; the work of Deal at the plaintiff's factory was left unfinished. Lord Ellenborough observed there was not evidence of the defendant's enticing the workman from his master, but there was enough of the harbouring after notice, and that was sufficient to support this action. Verdict for plaintiff 5l. 5s. being the value of the labour required to finish the work.

LIBEL.

M'Lealan v. Field.

June 10.—Mr. Garrow stated the parties to be inhabitants of Plymouth; the plaintiff a surgeon in the hospital, and the defendant a gent. who had retired with a large fortune from the naval service. The action was brought to recover a compensation for the most severe injury of which a subject could complain. Mr. M'Lealan had been denounced as a traitor. He accused the defendant of being the author of this malignant libel; the defendant had denied the charge, but by the evidence to be produced it would be clearly brought home to him. The following anonymous letter had been sent to the late chancellor of the exchequer in the beginning of the last year:

"Hon. Sir, The purport of this letter is to warn you that there is in this place a very disaffected person to his king and country. He is very industrious in sowing the seeds of sedition. He is a surgeon in the hospital at Plymouth. He takes every means of becoming acquainted with the character and conduct of the officers, and exerts himself to the utmost to defame them. He tells the men that they have as good a right to command as their superiors, and to be all equal, like their neighbours the French. He often hopes that Bonaparte will land. He is very cunning. His name is M'Lealan. Many people know that what I say is true, but they are afraid to come forward. I myself find it necessary to conceal my name for the present. I look upon you as a person faithful to your king and country, and having imparted this intelligence to you, I feel easy in the consciousness of having done my duty.

The Rt Hon. W. Pitt,
Walmer Castle.

Plymouth Dock."

Mr. Mawl proved that Mr. M'Lealan was a surgeon in the royal navy. Mr. Reynolds produced the original letter, which had been delivered to him by the lords of the admiralty. Mr. Langstaff stated, that he had often seen the defendant write, and he said he had no doubt whatever that it was his writing. He observed that several of the words were mis-spelt, and particularly that warn was wrote worn; but he knew that Mr. F. spelt very ill, and that he often wrote an o for an a. Mr. Ellis, a tailor, Mr. W. Kitto, a tenant of Mr. Field's, and Mrs. Kitto, his wife, all deposed that they had often seen the defendant write, and firmly believed the letter to be his hand-writing. Mrs. K. said, that on Friday was eight days Mr. Field came to the house, and asked if her husband was going up to London to give evidence for M'Lealan. He assured her that she had better prevent him, as M'Lealan's witnesses would not get back. He himself was innocent, and he would have all of them convicted of perjury. He earnestly requested her not to let out of her hands any of the receipts he had given her husband for rent.—Mr. Pitt should here have been called, but the following indorsement on the letter was admitted as sufficient evidence of his having received it:

"I perfectly remember a short time after my quitting office, of having received, among my post letters at Park Place, a letter to the purport of the above. I thought it of consequence that it should be immediately communicated to the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and I sent that day, or the day after, to Mr. Nepean.

"W. PITT."

Mr. Erskine allowed the malignity of the libel, but contended that Mr. Field had never wrote it.—He undertook to produce witnesses to contradict those that had been called in the most positive manner, and if a doubt could possibly remain, he was sure the jury would incline to the defendant, when he could have had no possible motive for so base an action.

James Wall said he was a lieutenant in the navy. He was sure that the letter was not the defendant's writing.—He had not seen him, however, since 1782, till Friday last. Mary Sharpe (wife of the patent razor-maker, Ludgate-hill) declared that it had not the slightest resemblance to the defendant's hand. She had received orders from him, and would not have acted upon this. W. Field, the defendant's son, said he was a lieutenant in the navy: he allowed that the letter was like his father's hand; still it did not follow that it was his, as one day lately, at his agent's, he had seen a letter with the superscription so like his, that he was going to open it as coming from his father, though it had a different signature. From what he knew of his father, and had heard him say, he did not believe the letter had been wrote by him. The inside was very like his, and, if he had seen it lying on the table, he should have taken it for his. There had been some differences between McLealan and his father about the management of the poor-house.—Lord Ellenborough observed, that if the plaintiff had been guilty of the practices imputed to him, no man could be more heinously criminal. He was charged with having abused the trust confided in him to poison the minds of the seamen, and, at a time of great anxiety and danger, of having leagued with the enemies of his country. The letter was a libel of enormous malignity, and the grand question for the jury to try was, whether the defendant was the writer of it? The jury certainly ought to be more than usually scrupulous in considering evidence of this kind. In general, witnesses were produced who swore that they had seen the act committed, and the proof here rested solely on the similarity of handwriting. However, there was no doubt that this might be sufficient both in law and in reason. The jury would therefore say, whether, upon the whole evidence, the charge had been established. His lordship observed, that, if the jury were of that opinion, the only remaining question was the amount of the damages. The property of the plaintiff had been proved to be great, and, whether it was or not, they were chiefly to consider the magnitude of the injury the plaintiff had sustained. He was at any rate entitled to an adequate compensation. He enjoyed a respectable situation as surgeon to the hospital, from which he would have been ignominiously dismissed, had the libel produced the desired effect. The object of the writer evidently was to consign him to poverty and infamy. If a man had actually betrayed his country at its utmost peril, what fate could have been too severe for him? Had this communication been well-founded, though anonymous, it would have been laudable; but the writer should have been so sure of the truth of what he asserted as to be able, when called upon, to establish it to the satisfaction of a jury. He might have reasons to justify him for withdrawing from public notice for a time; but he should at all times have been ready to shew that he had proceeded with caution; that his motives were pure, and that his only object was the public good. Verdict for plaintiff—damages £500.

Carey v. Keesley.

June 11.—This was an action for copying and pirating the book of the plaintiff called "Carey's Itinerary," by a publication of the defendant called "The Traveller's Companion," &c. It appeared in the course of examination of the two publications, that the defendant's book contained much of the matter which before was to be found in no other publication than the plaintiff's book, and therefore was taken from it, but that not a page of it was selected in which the copy was not accompanied by substantive matter that was not signal, and the whole arrangement of the defendant's book was different from that of the plaintiff; indeed, they were both taken from the book of Patterson's roads. Lord Ellenborough was of opinion, that upon this issue the plaintiff had not made out his case, for that there was no evidence that the defendant's book was a piratical publication, or copy of the plaintiff's book; and this, his lordship said, he was prepared to submit as his opinion to the jury. The plaintiff's counsel observed, that the main object of the action was, to protect Mr. Carey in his exclusive right of publication of his own book; and as this was deemed not to be a copy of it, that right remained entire, the plaintiff's anxiety was at an end. Lord E. said, that, certainly this cause did not touch the plaintiff's right to the publication of his book; that right remained in the same situation as it stood in before this action was brought. Plaintiff non-suited.

Waterhouse v. King.

July 2.—This was a special case, reserved for the opinion of the court. The plaintiff was 2nd capt. of the ship Reliance, appointed on the service for Botany Bay. The first officer of the ship was capt. Hunter. The plaintiff was 2nd in command, and he was appointed to this office of 2nd capt. or 2nd in command, by the lords of the admiralty. While this ship was at Plymouth, the Dutch fleet there was detained by order of govt. and was afterwards condemned as prize, upon the breaking out of hostilities between this country and Holland; and this ship, being part of admiral King's fleet which was at Plymouth when the Dutch fleet was detained, the ship's officers, &c. became entitled to their share of prize-money in the proportion stated by his majesty's proclamation; but it was contended that this plaintiff, capt. Waterhouse, being 2nd in command to another officer, who was the capt. he could not be held to be a capt. of that ship, inasmuch as that the lords of the admiralty had no power to make this appointment of 2nd capt. without submitting it expressly to the approbation of his majesty in council; and that for want of that submission and approbation, this appointment was void. Capt. Waterhouse brought his action for the recovery of this prize-money, which was tried at Westminster, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon this case, upon the construction of all the orders in council, proclamations, &c. made in this behalf from the year 1750 down to that of 1786, when the Botany Bay settlement had transports sent to it, and on account of which service this appointment, by the lords of the admiralty, took place. This case was argued, very ably, by Mr. Barton, for the plaintiff, and Mr. Gazely, for the defendant. Mr. B. contended that the plaintiff was appointed by the lords of the admiralty as capt. who were duly empowered by the king for that purpose: that he was capt. therefore in rank, in station, in duty, liable to all the provisions of a court-martial, punished under the authority of martial law, for misconduct, in the character of capt.: that he was so mustered upon the books: that he was, and must be, taken to be capt. de facto, if not de jure: that he was both, but it would be enough for him to be either, in order to become entitled to his share of prize-money in this case, under his majesty's proclamation, and that therefore he was entitled to the judgment of the court.—Mr. G. contended, that although this plaintiff was on board in the rank of a 2nd capt.

appointed by the lords commissioners of the admiralty, yet, that as this appointment was never submitted to his majesty in council, nor had received the royal approbation, it was null and void; and this was contended under the authority of capt. Lumley's case, when the contest was between him and capt. Sutton: that even by the plaintiff's own confession, in this case, it appeared, that whatever rights he might have, as commander, in the absence of capt. Hunter, he had no authority, as capt. while capt. Hunter was on board; that then, he was a mere assistant of Mr. Hunter. That whatever his station was, he was not a capt. of the ship in question. That, in short, on the ground that the lords of the admiralty had no power to make this increase to the estab. of the navy, without the authority of the crown; that, even if he was to be considered as capt. in some sense of that title, he did not come within the description of capt. that was entitled to a share as such of the prize-money, in this case, under the royal proclamation, &c.

Mr. Justice Lawrence said, that, upon this occasion, two questions arose: the first was, whether or not the plaintiff's appointment was sufficient to the office of 2nd capt. of this ship, the Reliance? The next was, supposing him to be so regularly appointed, whether, under the king's proclamation, he was entitled to a share of the prize-money in this case? Upon the first of these questions, as to the power of the lords of the admiralty to make this appointment, the learned judge observed, that the letters patent, under the great seal, specifying the powers of the lords of the admiralty, were not before the court: but he understood their power in general to be that of providing for the navy of this kingdom, for which purpose it was necessary to equip ships, appoint officers to command crews in action, &c. subject to the general direction of the crown: that their power was directive, and that of the crown directory: that, in consequence of this power, the lords of the admiralty had appointed the plaintiff second capt. or second in command, of this ship, as they might do for that or any other ship in the navy, as might appear to them necessary for the exigency of the public service. The next question would be, whether he would be entitled under the proclamation, to come in for his share of the prize-money? It was argued, that the plaintiff had no command, but in the absence of capt. Hunter; now, on looking at his commission, it would appear this argument was not founded. It gave the plaintiff the rank of 2nd capt. or 2nd commander, and then it went on to state, "That, in the absence of the principal commander, the plaintiff was to act as the sole commander. That, in the presence of the first commander, he was to be subject to his direction," so that, in his absence, he was to become the absolute commander of it himself: it appeared by his commission, that capt. W. had powers without reference to those of capt. Hunter, for the commissioners, in the language of the commission, said, "We appoint you 2nd commander of the Reliance, desire you to go on board and take the 2nd comm. of her accordingly;" and then, without saying any thing of the presence or the absence of the first commander, the commission went on to describe the duty of the 2nd commander, as known to those who should be required to obey him. Capt. W. had also his number of servants to obey him in the stile of a captain, with the other distinctions that were incident to such station, and these he was to have, whether capt. Hunter was on board or absent. Then, taking the plaintiff to be rightly appointed, and in a manner sufficient to determine that he was capt. de facto, the next question was, whether he came in under the proclamation for the distribution of prize-money? He was in the station of capt. and as to his being 2nd capt. of a single ship, he did not see that the lords of the admiralty should not have power to make that appointment, if necessary, for the navy, as well as any other regulation. Mr. Justice le Blanc thought the plaintiff entitled to a share of prize in this case, as a capt. in the situation in which he was, being appointed to that situation, by virtue of a commission granted to him by the lords of the admiralty, and that he must always be entitled to all the privileges attached to that station, unless it could be shewn that the lords of the admiralty had exceeded their power in granting him that commission. This was a different case from that of capt. Lumley, and the appointment must, upon the whole, be held to be valid. The next question was, whether the plaintiff came under the rules laid down in his Majesty's proclamation? Now he was a capt. on board at the time of the capture, as the exigency of the service required, and therefore there was no reason why he should not have all the benefit of that situation. Judgment for plaintiff.

COMMON PLEAS.—Furtado v. Rogers.

July 2.—This was an action upon a policy of insurance, dated the 19th of Oct. 1792, on a ship called the Patronelle, from Bayonne to Martinique, and at and from thence to Bayonne, to recover a loss by capture. The cause was tried before the lord Alvanley, chief justice of the Common Pleas, at the sittings in Trinity term, 1801, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court, upon the following case: that the plaintiff was owner of the ship, which sailed upon the voyage, insured in Oct. 1792, and arrived at Martinique in Nov. following; remained there until March 1794, but her so remaining was justified by necessity, and war having broken out between this country and France---she was then, upon the capture of the island of Martinique, by the Brit. forces, taken by them as prize, with 40 other French vessels. The plaintiff, at the time the policy was effected, and from thence until the action was commenced, was a French subject, resident at Bayonne, in France, which country was in amity with G. Brit. when the policy was effected, and until the month of Feb. 1793, at which time hostilities commenced between England and France. Mr. serj. Bayley observed, that the question in this cause for the decision of the court, was, whether the subject of the insurance, belonging to a person who was in amity with this kingdom, at the time the insurance was effected, and being afterwards, in consequence of a breach of that amity, taken by one of the vessels of this country, whether such a plaintiff, had or had not a right to recover? He should first consider this case on the authorities, because it seemed to him those authorities were so strong, that it was not necessary to recur to the principle on which these authorities were founded. He observed, that in these cases, the very same objection might have been taken, that was meant to be taken in this case by his brother Best, but it had not, in fact, been taken. But though the question was never raised, yet as it might have been raised in these cases, and as the parties never did raise it, an inference arose, which he thought could not be got over, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. He had made use of those authorities for the purpose of shewing that they constituted a series of decisions, for a great length of time, by which he conceived that this country was, as it were, pledged, to foreigners, to perform such a contract as that which was contained in this policy. His learned brother would probably argue, that if the court were to decide, that on such a policy the plaintiff was entitled to recover, the consequence would be, that of taking out of the pockets of the Brit. underwriters, the amount of this loss, which it was meant the enemy should sustain, and that, in fact, the only loss sustained would be by one part of the king's subjects, instead of the enemy. He observed that an alien enemy could bring no action during war, and it would be for the king, when he made peace, to declare on what terms that peace should be made, and whether that an alien enemy should ever have a right of action vested in him, and whether the underwriters should pay this money. The king, if he chose, had a right to insist upon the payment of that money. The king, upon inquisition found, would be entitled to the payment of that money. The king might either exert the right which his prerogative gave him, to insist on the payment of that money to him, or he might dispense with that right in favour of some of his subjects; and it was only by the licence of the crown, or the negligence of the crown, that the alien enemy could afterwards insist on his right of action. No loss, therefore, was thrown on any subject of this country during the war, except it was by the intervention of the king. The ground, therefore, on which he humbly submitted he was entitled to the judgment of the court, was this, that there had been a long series of authorities during which this question had repeatedly occurred, but had never been raised in any one of these cases; and this furnished a strong argument in his favour, unless his learned brother could produce some actual decision, which excluded the plaintiff from recovering. No case had been decided saying that a policy of insurance on enemy's property during the war was illegal. Mr. serjeant East, on behalf of the underwriters, said, he was to address the court in support of the objection, which he had the honour to take before his ldp at the trial. His learned brother had thought it necessary to cite a vast number of cases: but one observation, he thought, would dispose of all those cases. In no one of them was this point ever taken. It was impossible, therefore, that these cases could be considered as any authorities on this point, when the point did not come under discussion before the court. It was also material to observe, that at the time these cases came under discussion, it was understood that the property of enemies could be insured flagrante bello. The question was, whether an insurance effected antecedent to the commencement of war, could be legal, when that property was afterwards taken by the force of this country? He conceived the case must depend entirely upon principle; for, after looking into all the books, he had not been able to find one case in which the point in question had been decided. But he conceived that on principle, as old as the law itself, it was impossible

the plaintiff could recover in this action. He trusted that what he was about to state was not only applicable to the law of insurance, but to be considered as a general principle of law—it was this—"that whatever was against the general interests of any state, was against the law of that state." It was a general principle of the law of England, that whenever it was shewn that the enforcing of a contract would be against the general interests of the community, there the court was vested with a general power to declare that that contract should not be carried into execution. Suppose a contract to be entered into, the enforcing of which would be contrary to the morals of the country? There was no particular law which said, that contract should not be carried into execution; but their lordships were declared by the law of the country, to be the guardians of the morals of the country; and therefore, on that principle, the court would not allow any contract to be enforced which was against the principles of morality. In the same manner the court would not allow any contract to be carried into effect which had a tendency to injure the revenue of the country. So, in various instances of bets or wagers, which had a tendency to bring into discussion things that were unfit to be discussed in public courts of justice; so the court would not enforce any contract which militated against any civil estab. as against marriage—or that affected the trade of the country, or that would tend to the breach of any law of the country. There was no law that said these contracts should not be enforced; but the same general principle which required that the court, in all these cases, in which they should be satisfied that the carrying the contract into execution would be injurious to the interests of the public—would induce them to say, that this contract should not be carried into effect. He would submit that the law had gone further on the subject—it had not only said, that no contract should be enforced which was detrimental to the public interests, but the law would not allow a man to place himself in any situation in which his interest, as a subject, should be at variance with the interests of the country. That appeared to be the strongest reason in support of the doctrine he was contending for. He admitted that the contract was good as to all the risks that fell within it, but that that was not one of those risks—it was good for every purpose consistent with the law, but it could not be extended beyond the law. He could shew, on the authority of those cases he had cited, that this contract had a tendency to place a man's interest in direct opposition to the interests of the state, and to make him a bad subject; on the same principle on which these cases had been decided, the court would hold that the plaintiff could not recover. He observed, that the great object of insurance was to enable the subjects of this country to carry on commerce to a greater extent than it was possible they could if the risks of it were cast wholly on themselves, instead of being divided among the underwriters. The object of insurance was to encourage commerce; the object of war was to destroy the commerce of another country, and, therefore, the effect of insuring enemies' property must be to encourage them to engage in speculations and enterprizes to bring property into their country, to increase their strength, to aid, to assist them, and to enable them to resist us; although the object of war was to destroy them. When it was to be considered, that war in modern times was carried on chiefly by the finances of a state, and that money was the sinew of war, it was impossible for any man not to see, that this policy of assurance was in direct opposition to the best and most important interests of the country. Mr. serj. Bayley replied;—after which, such was thought the importance of the case, that it was agreed to turn it into a special verdict, in order that it may receive the most solemn decision possible.

KING'S BENCH.

Clanfield Assignee of Michael Fisher, a Bankrupt, v. Edwards.

July 19.—This was an action brought by the assignees of a bankrupt, to recover a bill of exchange, and several articles of goods, the value of which was 122*l*.—Mr. Garrow stated that this was an extraordinary case, even in these extraordinary times. Fisher, the bankrupt, whose assignee the plaintiff was, had the misfortune to be concerned with the defendant, Mr. Edwards, who is a jeweller in London, and discounted bills for Fisher, the terms of which were, half in money, and half in jewelry goods, and then Mr. E. bought them back again of him, at a slight loss, that was to say, at the loss, in some cases, of two shillings per ounce, and in others, six shillings per ounce. This ended, as all these things must end, in the bankruptcy and absolute ruin of the party borrowing the money: the time at which that ruin should take place, and be made public, depended, in a great measure, on the usurer. Mr. E. knew the manner in which Mr. Fisher was going on; knew he must soon be declared a bankrupt; and, in contemplation of that bankruptcy, Mr. E. went to the house of Fisher, and took away these goods, in order to help himself to what was due to him. He possessed himself also of the bill of exchange in question, and upon application to him, on behalf of the creditor, to deliver these things up, he refused, and this action was brought upon that refusal, for the purpose of bringing this property to the use of the creditors.—It appeared, that the defendant had taken possession of these goods in question, knowing that Fisher had committed acts of bankruptcy, he having frequently concealed himself from his creditors, delaying their debts, &c. and as to the bill of exchange, it appeared by the evidence of the bankrupt, Fisher, himself, that part of the consideration of the bill of exchange, was a discount partly in cash, and partly in jewelry, which he charged at 11*s* per ounce, which was the credit price of that article in the market, the ready money price being only 9*s*. That Fisher had been long in the habit of discounting bills with Edwards, and generally took part in money and part in jewelry, about half of the one and half of the other. Sometimes he worked up the jewelry articles in the way of his trade, but frequently was obliged to sell the gold, and that mostly to the defendant, E. himself, and upon which Fisher lost 6*s*. per ounce, &c.—Lord Ellenborough said, that if there was any usury in any part of this case, it tainted the whole of the transaction to which it referred. Such was the case here, as it applied to this bill of exchange, for if in discounting this bill, E. gave part in goods, and charged for such goods the credit, instead of the ready money price, that was usury in discounting; for discount, in its nature, was ready money, lent at the rate or price of five per cent. but here was discount; and, instead of goods of the same value as ready money, goods were given of only the proportion of nine to eleven of ready money, and that was clearly usury. As to the goods taken by the defendant in contemplation of bankruptcy, they must likewise be brought to the use of the creditors. The consequence of which must be, that the bill of exchange must be delivered up; and as to the goods, a verdict should be given for their value, since the assignee could not take them to be used in trade.—Verdict for plaintiff; damages 122*l*. the defendant undertaking to deliver up the bill of exchange.

Blake v. the Governor and Company of the Bank of England.

July 21.—This was an action against the bank of England, on one of their promissory notes for 1000*l*. which they refused to pay, on the ground that it was a note which had been lost, and the value of which they had already paid, being indemnified by the assignees of the bankrupt, who either lost the note, or with a fraudulent intent pretended to have lost it.—Mr. Park observed, that this was a cause of the utmost importance to the public, as it would determine the degree of credit and confidence they should give to a note, which they knew to be a bank of England note. His client was a silversmith, in very respectable and extensive business, who resided in Castle-street, Leicester-fields. He had taken the note in the course of his trade, for full and valuable consideration, and was not bound to enquire into the history of the note, or through what hands it had passed. Nothing, he contended, could be more ruinous to the commerce of the country, or to the true interests of the bank itself, than that so formidable an obstacle should be thrown in the way of the free circulation of bank-notes, as to require that every trader, who received a bank-note in the course of his business, should examine, through what hands a note, which is offered to him as cash, has passed, before it was presented to him as a payment. The learned counsel then cited several cases which had been determined before lord Mansfield and lord Kenyon, confirming the principle he then laid down. Upon these grounds, which he considered the settled law of the land, he had to sustain the character as well as the claim of the plaintiff. The circumstances of the transactions were as follows:—On the 5th of April last, the plaintiff received a letter by the post, having the Bath post mark on it, which letter was signed "R. Dallow," in which the writer described himself as a person who expected a large sum of money from an uncle in order to set him up in the business of silversmith at Bath; he therefore desired the plaintiff to send him an account of the prices he would charge for an assortment of goods, specified in the letter, at the same time mentioning, that as he should pay ready money, he would expect to be charged at the lowest price. In consequence of this letter, the plaintiff sent down a list of prices he charged for the articles therein specified. Another letter came by return of the post, giving a positive order for the goods to the amount of 800*l*. and desiring that they might be got ready as soon as possible. On the 21st of April, the person who styled himself "Dallow" called upon the plaintiff, and asked for so much of the goods as were ready for delivery pursuant to his order; the plaintiff accordingly delivered him goods to the amount of 545*l*. 10*s*.; he also delivered in cash, bank-notes and checks upon bankers, the difference between the value of the goods so furnished, and the amount of the bank-note for £1000. Dallow went off the night he had so received the goods and cash, and has not since been heard of. The plaintiff considered himself entitled to recover against the bank for the amount of their note, which he had so received in the course of his business for a full consideration.—The note was admitted to be a note of the bank of England.—E. Medlicott, clerk to the plaintiff, proved the receipt of those letters by the post; the execution of the order in consequence of them; and the delivery of the goods, and of the difference between their value and the note of £1000. He added, that Dallow was an utter stranger to them; that the payment was made, and the goods delivered, about nine o'clock on the night of the 22d of April last; that neither he nor Mr. Blake had any suspicions of the note not having been honestly obtained by Dallow; and that the only observation they made to him upon it was, that it was a very old note; to which he answered "If my uncle had lived, it would not have seen the light for a considerable time longer." The next day he took the note to the bank, in order to have it changed for smaller notes; but they refused paying it on the grounds before mentioned.—J. Blake, the son of the plaintiff, C. Pepper, his apprentice, and W. Figg, his shopman, confirmed the testimony of Medlicott, as to the delivery of the goods and consideration for this note. One of his workmen also proved the execution of the order; and the clerk of the refiner from whom he bought his silver proved that at that time he had bought an unusual quantity of silver.—A clerk of Mr. Drummond's proved the payment of one of the checks which had been given to this person of the name of "Dallow."—The letters of Dallow, and the entries made by the plaintiff's clerk, were also read in evidence for the plaintiff.—Mr. Erskine, on the part of the defendants, observed, that it was not the bank, but those gents. to whom the bank had already paid the full amount of this note (as a lost note), that were the real defendants in this action; that this action must be judged by the peculiar circumstances attending it. Was it not suspicious that so large an order should have been at once executed for an utter stranger? That an old note to the amount of £1000 should be taken without the least inquiry from a total stranger? If the jury could not conceive a tradesman of common prudence and discretion to act in this manner in the ordinary course of his business, they must suppose that he had not taken this bill bona fide in the course of business, and must have known, or at least strongly suspected, that the person who offered it in payment, had not come fairly by it. In such case they must find their verdict for the defendant.—Mr. Kay, solicitor to the bank, proved that in a conversation he had with the plaintiff a few days after the bill had been presented and refused payment at the bank, the plaintiff positively refused to take any trouble in tracing out this person calling himself "Dallow," unless the bank would pay his expences.—Mr. A. Newland proved, that it was a very uncommon circumstance to have a note of £1000, which was nine years old, presented to the bank for payment; he said that notes which were more than a year old always underwent a particular examination at the bank before they were paid. An old gazette was also produced, which contained an advertisement of this note as being lost.—Lord Ellenborough summed up the evidence, and pointed out every minute circumstance that could direct the jury to form a right judgment on the fact, whether the plaintiff had conducted himself with such common prudence and discretion, as to deserve to be considered a bona fide holder of the note in question. If he either knew or suspected that the bill was not fairly obtained, or if such strong grounds of suspicion presented themselves as that any man of common caution could not avoid suspecting it, in such case, this strong suspicion would have an effect like a formal notice to prevent his being considered a bona fide holder of the note, even though he might have given consideration for it. Whether this transaction was or was not, under such circumstances of suspicion, it was the province of the jury to decide.—The jury found for the plaintiff—Damages £1000.

Antoin v. Critico. (July 23.) Mr. Erskine stated, that this was an action by the plaintiff, a Dalmatian, and subject of the emperor of Germany, against Theodore Critico, the defendant, who was a subject of the Sublime Porte, and the jury would find by the evidence, as complete a Turk as ever existed; for he had got his client's money to a large amount, and now had gone to goal, and held his creditor at arm's length. The circumstances which gave rise to this cause were as follows:—The plaintiff had lent the defendant money, with which he had bought a ship. The plaintiff also freighted that ship from Trieste to Guadaloupe, and had provided also a freight at Guadaloupe back again to Trieste. Critico performed the voyage, and took in the lading, and was on his return home, when he was intercepted by the Brit. ship, the Lapwing, and carried into St. Kitt's, where the ship and cargo were condemned as enemy's property. From that sentence he appealed, and the appeal was heard before the lords of the council, in this country, and the sentence of the admiralty court was reversed. In consequence of this reversal, the captors were obliged to make restitution; but, as the goods were sold, they could not be restored, except in value. He accordingly had received from the agents here, the sum of £4163. which sum he was bound to account for to the owner of the cargo, the present plaintiff; he however dishonestly refused to pay it over, but rather chose to waste it in a jail. The action had been before the court on a former occasion, when the defence set up was, that he was entitled to retain a part of it, as a part of the cargo was his own private adventure, and that the ship was totally his own. As they could not then give distinct evidence how the gross sum ought to be proportioned, his ldp was of opinion that the form of action could not be sustained, but that the plaintiff must be non-suited. They now, however, could distinctly ascertain, by his own affidavit, how much was his share of the cargo; and having proved that, the residue must of course be the property of the plaintiff.—The affidavit alluded to of Critico, was accordingly put in and read, in which he claimed a part, as his private adventure; but, on referring to the bill of sales, from the admiralty court, at St. Kitt's, it appeared, that it was the cargo only, which that accounted for, and that the private adventure and value of the ship were not accounted for there, consequently that the whole received under that was the proceeds of the cargo of the plaintiff. The agent of the house of Benucci and Co. at Trieste, proved that Critico had also received £572. from them, on account of the plaintiff, while he remained here prosecuting his claim before the privy council.—The agent of the prize agent also proved, that he had paid Critico £5598. 17s. 3d. pursuant to the sentence of the lords reversing the judgment of the court of admiralty; these two sums made an amount of £4165. 17s. 3d. with which the defendant stood charged.—Mr. Parke, for the defendant, made a very able speech, in which he represented him as an Asiatic, totally unacquainted with our manners; that he felt he had a claim to a part of this property, and not knowing how here to prosecute his claim, he refused to give up what he had received until it was adjusted. With respect to his going to prison, the plaintiff had arrested him for £4000. and, as a total stranger here, he knew not where to find bail, and therefore of necessity was obliged to go to prison. Mr. Parke then commented on several parts of Mr. Erskine's speech, and observed that there was no proof that his ship was purchased with the money of the plaintiff; on the contrary, it appeared on the face of the admiralty proceedings, that he was sole owner. He then claimed freight, agency for three years in recovering the ship and cargo, and law expenses, to be deducted by his client from the gross sum which he had received.—As Critico made the claim on behalf of himself, as well as his owner, his allowances for agency, law expenses, &c. were calculated upon a deduction according to the amount of his interest.—Verdict for plaintiff for £5200.

YORK ASSIZES.—Breach of Promise of Marriage.—Storey v. Eagle.—Mr. Serjeant Heywood stated the case of the plaintiff; he observed, that of all the wounds which can be given to the feelings of an individual, the one which is perhaps the most severely felt, is that injury for which his client now sought for compensation. She was, it was true, in a very humble situation in life, a maid-servant to Mr. Stockdale of Knaresborough; but the feelings of the humblest individual are not wantonly and barbarously to be outraged, nor solemn promises to be broken, without giving that individual a right to appeal to a jury for a compensation adequate to the injury sustained. It was not merely to recover damages that his client brought the present action, but also to vindicate her character, which she found might suffer from so sudden and unaccountable a desertion as she has experienced from the man who had publicly professed himself her lover, and courted her for two years, and yet quitted her the day before that which was appointed for their marriage. The defendant in this action was also himself in an humble situation in life; he had been an hostler in the town of Knaresborough when first he began his courtship, but is now an innkeeper in that town, and worth 600*l.* by his own confession. Among the letters she had received from him lately, was the following:—“Dear Mary,—This is to you whom I love more than life. I am as sincere in this as if I was at the hour of my death, confessing to my Creator. But what nonsense is it to talk at present of either death or my Creator, when I am addressing myself to you, who are the centre of all my wishes? All that I have is yours, and all that I ask heaven to grant is, that I may see the happy day when I may call you mine. I am your humble servant, and most sincere lover,

The plaintiff, who was at first averse to his suit, certainly had consented to it at last; the day of marriage had been fixed, and preparations made for it, when the defendant suddenly, and without reason, changed his mind, married a girl then resident at Harrowgate, and has now set up an inn at Knaresborough.—Ellen Sly was the principal witness for the plaintiff. She had known her for the last two years. The witness washed for Mr. Stockdale during the whole of that time; and almost every washing-day she had seen the defendant by the side of the plaintiff's tub, paying his addresses to her. He appeared to be sincerely in love with her, and often talked of marriage, but at length told her of his taking the house, and consulted her about the furniture and provisions he was to lay in, and whether it was best to get corn or flour. At that time the marriage seemed very near, when he told the witness that he was in a very distressing situation; there was a dead girl at Harrowgate to whom he had promised marriage before two witnesses, and who vowed she would prosecute him if he did not keep his promise. He accordingly went to Harrowgate, and on his return told the witness he had settled with that girl, and asked if Mary (the plaintiff) would marry him the next day. The witness bid him ask Mary;—he accordingly did so; and the plaintiff that day gave her mistress warning, and gave the witness a gown, petticoat, and pair of stockings, to be washed against the next day, and made some other little preparations for her approaching nuptials. Before the next day came, the defendant disappeared, and in a day or two after married the Harrowgate girl. About a fortnight after he paid a visit to the witness, with whom the plaintiff was then sitting; the plaintiff told him, “She would be glad to wish him joy, but his bad behaviour would not allow her.” The defendant said, “he was very sorry, and would make her any compensation in his power.” Mrs. Sly said, he ought to give her thirty guineas: he replied, “She will never take that.” Mary then burst out a crying, and left the house; the defendant followed and overtook her, and the next day told the witness she had cried a great deal, and he was extremely sorry for her.—One Piercy, a servant of Mr. Stockdale's, proved that the defendant had applied to him to procure a licence, and that the plaintiff had made preparations for the marriage; and, in particular, had borrowed linen and other things from him.—On his cross-examination, he was asked why those things were borrowed only? he answered, because the marriage bore a very unplush kind of appearance. Being requested to explain the meaning of the word unplush, he said the defendant did not know his own mind, and therefore it was a doubt whether the marriage would take place or not.—Mr. Park said, that although this little ple-house which the defendant had taken at Knaresborough, was, for the purposes of this cause, swelled into a great inn, and it was attempted to insinuate, that the defendant was a man of property; yet, in truth and in fact, he was a poor man now, and had been an humble noster when first he paid his devotions at the shrine of his adoration, the wash-tub of the plaintiff in this action: his client was a most unfortunate poor devil, and he trusted the jury would not, by giving heavy damages in this silly case, immure him in a jail for the rest of his days. For two long years his client had paid his addresses, and offered his sincere love, at the plaintiff's wash-tub; all that while the scornful lady of the suds refused his suit, and treated him with ineffable contempt; at length, wearied of her scorn, in a moment of despair and vexation, he talked of love and marriage to the Harrowgate girl, and, unfortunately for him, before two witnesses: in the mean time, the scornful beauty who brought the present action, hearing that he was going to take a house, and had some money, she immediately relaxed from her wonted cruelty, and consented to be his bride.—What was his poor client to do in such a dilemma? On the one hand, there was a most unexpected consent from the scornful nymph of the suds, who exclusively possessed his heart, and on the other, that d-d Harrowgate girl, as he had called her, with her two witnesses, threatening him with prosecution and a jail if he did not marry her. Was ever man (to use the expression of the witness) in such a nimply? Indeed, if the jury were to give much encouragement to these actions, every maid-servant in England would be bringing her action; for all of them have had, no doubt, in their turn, nonsense talked to them by idle fellows about love and marriage, and in the presence of some Mrs. Sny.—Lord Ellenborough said, that it had been clearly proved that the defendant had, both by his conduct, and by his express promise, raised expectations which he had defrauded, and hopes which he had deceived: the jury were, therefore, bound to give compensation in damages for the injury so received from the defendant by the plaintiff.—The jury, after a few minutes consideration, found for the plaintiff—50*l.* damages.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Before Lord Alvanley and a Special Jury. (Breach of Promise of Marriage.) Hand v. Kisten.—Mr. serj. Cockle stated, that his client was a young lady who sought redress for one of the most cruel injuries that could be offered to her sex. She resided at Harbro' with her brother, a respectable tradesman in that town. The defendant was put apprentice to Mr. Hand, and in the course of some years a mutual affection sprung up between him and Miss Hand. An engagement at last took place, and the lovers vowed eternal constancy. The term of the defendant's apprenticeship was now nearly expired, and he resolved to try his fortune in London. After a tender parting he accordingly set out. Miss Hand was much depressed, and her fears of the dissipation of the metropolis proved to have been prophetic. For some time, however, he remained true to his promises. He wrote her affectionate letters, and having seen her once in town, he testified all the fondness for her which had formerly marked his passion when at its height. But when he ought to have led her to the altar he forgot his plighted troth, and drew back from his sacred engagements. She was thus disappointed in her views of future happiness, and held up to the ridicule of all her acquaintance. The learned serjeant added many other particulars, and described in the most glowing terms the ill usage which Miss Hand had received. The evidence consisted chiefly of the letters which the defendant had wrote from London to his mistress at Harbro'. These occasioned infinite merriment. In the first place, they disclosed the fact that Mr. Kisten was a journeymen tailor-chundlor. In painting the ardour of his attachment, he likewise borrowed many terms from his art. Although it appeared that he was not always in a melting mood, he talks of his soul being assolved, of being dipped in wretchedness; of his heart being cast in a delicate mould, of the store of happiness which he conceived was awaiting him; of his love burning clear; of his liver being consumed like the wick of a candle; of his fears lest her passion died away like the flame in the socket of a candlestick, &c. &c. There was one passage which afforded peculiar amusement, as it reminded every one at the side of a noble marquis, who, after painting the ardour of his passion, stops suddenly short to descend upon the price of wheat in Reading market. "My love (says Mr. Kisten), my angel, my HAND, when shall we be joined together, and mir de war and spermeet?" By the bye, I have bad news for your brother. Tallow is as high as ever, and at present there is a prospect of its rising higher still. As such, he cannot do better than buy any that comes in his way?" From an able cross-examination, it came out that this disconsolate virgin is 37 years of age, and the fickle swain might almost be her son.—Mr. serj. Best addressed the jury in behalf of the defendant with habitual acumen and pathos. He allowed that the young man had acted very indiscreetly, but strenuously contended that the plaintiff had no reason to complain. He thought it unnecessary to call any witnesses, as it already appeared that the match was quite disproportionate, and that if it had taken place, it could have produced nothing but misery.—Lord Alvanley observed to the jury, that though cases of this kind were often very serious, yet that the present could scarcely be considered of such a complexion. From the rupture that took place, Miss Hand could scarcely be supposed to have been deprived of much happiness. Where the ages of the parties were so unequal, and where there had been no consent of parents, little could be expected but discord and misery. However, the lady had met with a disappointment, and was certainly entitled to some compensation. Verdict for the plaintiff—damages £100.

HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY, DOCTORS' COMMONS.

Captors of the Carolina Planter v. Bell, of Guernsey, and others. (Aug. 7.)—Yesterday a court of admiralty was held in Doctors' Commons, when the above long pending cause came on again to be argued. It appeared that, at the commencement of the late war, the ship Carolina Planter, of about 400 tons burthen, laden with a very valuable cargo of claret wines, brandies, &c. ostensibly bound to Hamburgh, but really for Guernsey, was taken in the English Channel by the Charming Molly, cutter privateer, the property of Mr. James Sheriff, merchant, and carried in there. It also appeared that the cargo was consigned to Mr. Bell, who resided at Guernsey, some of the casks being marked with his name: that Mr. Bell had arrested the ship and cargo at Guernsey, imprisoned the capt. and prize-master, and dispossessed them of the ship's papers: that the capt. had in durance signed his consent to a release of the ship and cargo, and bound himself in a heavy penalty not to proceed to adjudication. The owner, at this time being in England, as soon as he was enabled, protested against the illegal proceedings of all the parties; in defence of which Mr. Bell has contended these 9 years. He, however, being called on to the amount for the value of this cargo, by order of the court, exhibited his, and 16 or 17 other affidavits of principal wine-merchants in London, to whom Mr. Bell had re-shipped the greater part of these wines. Drs. Lawrence and Arnold appeared on behalf of Mr. Bell and the merchants; and contended, that as these gents. had sworn they had no knowledge of any proceedings being had in the court on these wines, and having received them into their general stock, and disposed of them indiscriminately, and also declaring, on their oaths, they could not ascertain their value at this distant period of time, and render an account of their proceeds, they ought to be dismissed the court, especially Mr. Bell, who had already paid his share in on oath. Sir J. Nicholl and Dr. Swabey appeared on behalf of the captors, and conjured the court to pronounce its solemn judgment; and allowing the capt. of the privateer's conduct to have been highly reprehensible in surrendering the ship and cargo to Mr. Bell, after being sent into Guernsey as prize, the owners of the privateer were entitled to the protection of the court from the effects of such a proceeding; in short, the captors had experienced sufficient punishment from the capt.'s misconduct, by a combinat on of oppressive circumstances that had borne severely hard on them, on account of this long and expensive litigation. The court could not but perceive, from the very nature of the affidavits, that the parties were still trifling with it, and that they were framed in a very cautious, but questionable shape. The court, most certainly, had long ago recommended the parties to an amicable adjustment of the business, by arbitration of counsel and merchants; to this recommendation the captors had bowed implicit obedience in every honourable way, but to no effect: the court was therefore called on in justice to decide on this very extraordinary case, on the face of which it plainly appeared a trade was carrying on with the enemy from Bourdeaux to Guernsey, under neutral colours, and must of course render the cargo in question liable to confiscation. After urging these, and many other arguments, in a clear point of view, the learned judge, Sir W. Scott, with his usual ability, commented on the different evidence before the court, and prefaced it by severely censuring the conduct of the capt. of the privateer, after taking possession of this ship and cargo as prize, by consenting to a release, a power he could not exercise when within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. As to the affidavits before the court, he was totally at a loss to imagine on what grounds the parties had not been able to render an account of the proceeds equally with Mr. Bell, who re-shipped these wines to them; he, no doubt, could have materially assisted them, had they applied to him; if not, the court cannot but suppose that all merchants keep an account of such shipments, to which, by reference, memory may at all times be strengthened. The learned judge concluded by strongly commenting on the tenor and similarity of the affidavits; and no neutral claimant appearing, condemned the whole cargo, subject to a valuation of the registry of merchants, and ordered monitions to be issued against those in Guernsey, who had acted in contempt of a former order of court.

OLD BAILEY, ADMIRALTY SESSIONS.

Tuesday, Oct. 26.—Brig Adventure.—Wm. Codling, John Read, John Easterby, and Wm. M'Farlane, were indicted for willfully and feloniously destroying the brig Adventure, bound from London to the Mediterranean, off Brighthelmston, on the coast of Sussex, on the 8th day of August last. There were a variety of counts, charging this offence on Codling, as the captain of the vessel, Read, as supercargo, and M'Farlane and Easterby, as owners of the vessel, with intention to defraud certain underwriters, named in the indictment, of £700, for which the cargo had been insured by them.—Mr. Marryatt opened the proceedings, and Mr. Garrow addressed the jury. He observed, that the indictment charged Codling and Read with being the acting principals in the destruction of the vessel, and M'Farlane and Easterby with procuring them to do so. This was an offence made capital in law, and when the jury reflected that in it was involved the life or death of four of their fellow creatures, they must consider it, in that point of view, as a case of very great importance. It was also of infinite importance to the community at large, inasmuch as it involved the vital interest of this great commercial country. The policy of our laws not only allowed, but protected the insurance of property, by which these risks and losses, which might be too heavy for individuals, were distributed amongst many, and thus came with less pressure in cases of mishap. In England alone, where commerce had arrived at so astonishing a degree of eminence, was it, that a certain, though a comparatively small, number of persons carried on the business of insuring from risk, not only our commerce, but also that of foreign countries; but there would be an end of those beneficial institutions, if frauds and crimes, of the nature they would now have to decide upon, were not fully guarded against, and very severely punished. All that was further required of him was to explain the nature of the case, and make it intelligible; to describe the sort of evidence he was instructed to bring forward; and, lastly, to conclude with some few general observations. The guilt of destroying the ship, though personally performed by Codling and Read, was equally imputed to them, as would appear by the statement he had to lay before them. It had been purchased at a public sale in May or June last, at which time it should seem that the owners, Easterby and M'Farlane, had this fraud in contemplation, from a variety of circumstances. It sailed from London for Yarmouth, in July, under the prisoner Codling; and though the owners had insured it with different underwriters, it was short of freight, and had 15 tons of ballast. A person of the name of Storow was then supercargo, but quitting the ship at Yarmouth on account of a rheumatic complaint, was succeeded in his employment by Read, one of the prisoners. By the departure of this man, the vessel was also without a mate, and the capt. instead of looking out for a person duly qualified, offered that birth to Cooper, then a common sailor before the mast. Cooper feeling himself inadequate to the task, from his being ignorant of navigation, told him so; but the capt. said, it would be sufficient if he behaved to

had been an humble hostler when first he paid his devotions at the shrine of his adoration, the wash-tub of the plaintiff in this action: his client was a most unfortunate poor devil, and he trusted the jury would not, by giving heavy damages in this silly case, immure him in a jail for the rest of his days. For two long years his client had paid his addresses, and offered his sincere love, at the plaintiff's wash-tub; all that while the scornful lady of the suds refused his suit, and treated him with ineffable contempt; at length, wearied of her scorn, in a moment of despair and vexation, he talked of love and marriage to the Harrogate girl, and, unfortunately for him, before two witnesses: in the mean time, the scornful beauty who brought the present action, hearing that he was going to take a house, and had some money, she immediately relaxed from her wonted cruelty, and consented to be his bride.—What was his poor client to do in such a dilemma? On the one hand, there was a most unexpected consent from the scornful nymph of the suds, who exclusively possessed his heart, and on the other, that d-d Harrogate girl, as he had called her, with her two witnesses, threatening him with prosecution and a jail if he did not marry her. Was ever man (to use the expression of the witnesses) in such a mumplish? Indeed, if the jury were to give much encouragement to these actions, every maid-servant in England would be bringing her action; for all of them have had, no doubt, in their turn, nonsense talked to them by idle fellows about love and marriage, and in the presence of some Mrs. Ship.—Lord Ellenborough said, that it had been clearly proved that the defendant had, both by his conduct, and by his express promise, raised expectations which he had defrauded, and hopes which he had deceived: the jury were, therefore, bound to give compensation in damages for the injury so received from the defendant by the plaintiff.—The jury, after a few minutes consideration, found for the plaintiff—50*l.* damages.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Before Lord Alvanley and a Special Jury. (Breach of Promise of Marriage.) Hand v. Kisten.—Mr. serj. Cockel stated, that his client was a young lady who sought redress for one of the most cruel injuries that could be offered to her sex. She resided at Harbro' with her brother, a respectable tradesman in that town. The defendant was put apprentice to Mr. Hand, and in the course of some years a mutual affection sprung up between him and Miss Hand. An exclamation went at last took place, and the lovers vowed eternal constancy. The term of the defendant's apprenticeship was now nearly expired, and he resolved to try his fortune in London. After a tender parting he accordingly set out. Miss Hand was much depressed, and her fears of the dissipation of the metropolis proved to have been prophetic. For some time, however, he remained true to his promises. He wrote her affectionate letters, and having seen her once in town, he testified all the fondness for her which had formerly marked his passion when at his height. But when he ought to have led her to the altar he forgot his plighted troth, and drew back from his sacred engagements. She was thus disappointed in her views of future happiness, and held up to the ridicule of all her acquaintance. The learned serjeant added many other particulars, and described in the most glowing terms the ill usage which Miss Hand had received. The evidence consisted chiefly of the letters which the defendant had wrote from London to his mistress at Harbro'. These occasioned infinite merriment. In the first place, they disclosed the fact that Mr. Kisten was a journeymen tobacco-chamber. In painting the ardour of his attachment, he likewise borrowed many terms from his art. Although it appeared that he was not always in a melting mood, he talks of his soul being Assolved, of being dipped in wretchedness; of his heart being cast in a delicate mould, of the store of happiness which he conceived was awaiting him; of his love burning clear; of his liver being consumed like the wick of a candle; of his tears lest her passion died away like the flame in the socket of a candlestick, &c. &c. There was one passage which afforded peculiar amusement, as it reminded every one of the stile of a noble marquis, who, after painting the ardour of his passion, stops suddenly short to descend upon the price of wheat in Reading market. "My love (says Mr. Kisten), my angel, my HANB, when shall we be joined together, and mix dike sware and spermeetti?" By the bye, I have bad news for your brother. Tallow is as high as ever, and at present there is a prospect of its rising higher still. As such, he cannot do better than buy any that comes in his way?" From an able cross-examination, it came out that this disconsolate virgin is 37 years of age, and the fickle swain might almost be her son.—Mr. serj. Best addressed the jury in behalf of the defendant with his usual acumen and pathos. He allowed that the young man had acted very indiscreetly, but strenuously contended that the plaintiff had no reason to complain. He thought it unnecessary to call any witnesses, as it already appeared that the match was quite disproportionate, and that if it had taken place, it could have produced nothing but misery.—Lord Alvanley observed to the jury, that though cases of this kind were often very serious, yet that the present could scarcely be considered of such a complexion. From the rupture that took place, Miss Hand could scarcely be supposed to have been deprived of much happiness. Where the ages of the parties were so unequal, and where there had been no consent of parents, little could be expected but discord and misery. However, the lady had met with a disappointment, and was certainly entitled to some compensation. Verdict for the plaintiff—damages £100.

HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY, DOCTORS' COMMONS.

Captors of the Carolina Planter v. Bell, of Guernsey, and others. (Aug. 7.)—Yesterday a court of admiralty was held in Doctors' Commons, when the above long pending cause came on again to be argued. It appeared that, at the commencement of the late war, the ship Carolina Planter, of about 400 tons burthen, laden with a very valuable cargo of claret wines, brandies, &c. ostensibly bound to Hamburg, but really for Guernsey, was taken in the English Channel by the Charming Molly, cutter privateer, the property of Mr. James Sheriff, merchant, and carried in there. It also appeared that the cargo was consigned to Mr. Bell, who resided at Guernsey, some of the casks being marked with his name: that Mr. Bell had arrested the ship and cargo at Guernsey, imprisoned the capt. and prize-master, and dispossessed them of the ship's papers: that the capt. had in durance

signed his consent to a release of the ship and cargo, and bound himself in a heavy penalty not to proceed to adjudication. The owner, at this time being in England, as soon as he was enabled, protested against the illegal proceedings of all the parties; in defence of which Mr. Bell has contended these 9 years. He, however, being called on to the amount for the value of this cargo, by order of the court, exhibited his, and 16 or 17 other affidavits of principal wine-merchants in London, to whom Mr. Bell had re-shipped the greater part of these wines. Drs. Lawrence and Arnold appeared on behalf of Mr. Bell and the merchants; and contended, that as these gents. had sworn they had no knowledge of any proceedings being had in the court on these wines, and having received them into their general stock, and disposed of them indiscriminately, and also declaring, on their oaths, they could not ascertain their value at this distant period of time, and render an account of their proceeds, they ought to be dismissed the court, especially Mr. Bell, who had already paid his share in on oath. Sir J. Nicholl and Dr. Swabey appeared on behalf of the captors, and conjured the court to pronounce its solemn judgment; and allowing the capt. of the privateer's conduct to have been highly reprehensible in surrendering the ship and cargo to Mr. Bell, after being sent into Guernsey as prize, the owners of the privateer were entitled to the protection of the court from the effects of such a proceeding; in short, the captors had experienced sufficient punishment from the capt.'s misconduct, by a combination of oppressive circumstances that had borne severely hard on them, on account of this long and expensive litigation. The court could not but perceive, from the very nature of the affidavits, that the parties were still trifling with it, and that they were framed in a very cautious, but questionable shape. The court, most certainly, had long ago recommended the parties to an amicable adjustment of the business, by arbitration of counsel and merchants; to this recommendation the captors had bowed implicit obedience in every honourable way, but to no effect: the court was therefore called on in justice to decide on this very extraordinary case, on the face of which it plainly appeared a trade was carrying on with the enemy from Bourdeaux to Guernsey, under neutral colours, and must of course render the cargo in question liable to confiscation. After urging these, and many other arguments, in a clear point of view, the learned judge, Sir W. Scott, with his usual ability, commented on the different evidence before the court, and prefaced it by severely censuring the conduct of the capt. of the privateer, after taking possession of this ship and cargo as prize, by consenting to a release, a power he could not exercise when within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. As to the affidavits before the court, he was totally at a loss to imagine on what grounds the parties had not been able to render an account of the proceeds equally with Mr. Bell, who re-shipped these wines to them; he, no doubt, could have materially assisted them, had they applied to him; if not, the court cannot but suppose that all merchants keep an account of such shipments, to which, by reference, memory may at all times be strengthened. The learned judge concluded by strongly commenting on the tenor and similarity of the affidavits; and no neutral claimant appearing, condemned the whole cargo, subject to a valuation of the registry of merchants, and ordered monitions to be issued against those in Guernsey, who had acted in contempt of a former order of court.

OLD BAILEY, ADMIRALTY SESSIONS.

Tuesday, Oct. 26.—Brig Adventure.—Wm. Codling, John Read, John Easterby, and Wm. M'Farlane, were indicted for wilfully and feloniously destroying the brig Adventure, bound from London to the Mediterranean, off Brighthelmston, on the coast of Sussex, on the 8th day of August last. There were a variety of counts, charging this offence on Codling, as the captain of the vessel, Read, as supercargo, and M'Farlane and Easterby, as owners of the vessel, with intention to defraud certain underwriters, named in the indictment, of £700, for which the cargo had been insured by them.—Mr. Marryatt opened the proceedings, and Mr. Garrow addressed the jury. He observed, that the indictment charged Codling and Read with being the acting principals in the destruction of the vessel, and M'Farlane and Easterby with procuring them to do so. This was an offence made capital in law, and when the jury reflected that in it was involved the life or death of four of their fellow creatures, they must consider it, in that point of view, as a case of very great importance. It was also of infinite importance to the community at large, inasmuch as it involved the vital interest of this great commercial country. The policy of our laws not only allowed, but protected the insurance of property, by which these risks and losses, which might be too heavy for individuals, were distributed amongst many, and thus came with less pressure in cases of mishap. In England alone, where commerce had arrived at so astonishing a degree of eminence, was it, that a certain, though a comparatively small, number of persons cared on the business of insuring from risk, not only our commerce, but also that of foreign countries; but there would be an end of those beneficial institutions, if frauds and crimes, of the nature they would now have to decide upon, were not fully guarded against, and very severely punished. All that was further required of him was to explain the nature of the case, and make it intelligible; to describe the sort of evidence he was instructed to bring forward; and, lastly, to conclude with some few general observations. The guilt of destroying the ship, though personally perpetrated by Codling and Read, was equally imputed to them, as would appear by the statement he had to lay before them. It had been purchased at a public sale in May or June last, at which time it should seem that the owners, Easterby and M'Farlane, had this fraud in contemplation, from a variety of circumstances. It sailed from London for Yarmouth, in July, under the prisoner Codling; and though the owners had insured it with different underwriters, it was short of freight, and had 15 tons of ballast. A person of the name of Storow was then supercargo, but quitting the ship at Yarmouth on account of a rheumatic complaint, was succeeded in his employment by Read, one of the prisoners. By the departure of this man, the vessel was also without a mate, and the capt. instead of looking out for a person duly qualified, offered that birth to Cooper, then a common tailor before the mast. Cooper feeling himself inadequate to the task, from his being ignorant of navigation, told him so; but the capt. said, it would be sufficient if he behaved to his satisfaction; upon which Cooper was appointed. Upon sailing from the Downs, the master told his mate that the ship was in no condition to go through the Bay of Biscay, and would soon be destroyed. He added, that he was himself a clumsy fellow, unable to go down the ship's side to bore a hole in the bottom, and commissioned his mate to perform that service for him, telling him he would find an auger in the cabin for that purpose. He then took the helm himself, and employed the rest of the crew aloft in hauling the sails, that they might not hear what was going forward. Cooper went down and bored three holes, when the rushing in of the water being heard by some of the crew, the capt. said it was no more than the beating of the water against the ship's side. Read, he must confess, had taken no active part in this transaction, though, as he must have heard it, being in bed near the locker, it was evident that this office of supercargo was meant to superintend the destruction of the ship. In order to give a more free admission to the water, the mate was ordered down again to make a larger hole, and to take out the auger which remained in one of the holes already made, which he accordingly did, and they all got into the boat, where, by the positive injunctions of the capt. nothing was admitted but four oars, and plenty of tholes, between which, in rowing, the oars are always inserted. It may be asked of him, how he could prove all this? Cooper, who should be called before them, undoubtedly stood in the light of an accomplice; he did not mean to represent him as an innocent man, and if the case was left to his evidence alone, it would be going too far for any jury to convict the prisoners. If, on the other hand, his evidence should be strongly confirmed, he would then stand before them as a competent and credible witness, and the jury would have only to ask themselves the question, whether they believed the evidence or not? He was well assured he would be enabled to build Cooper up, and surround him with a rampart and a tower of confirmation, so that his credibility could not be effectually assailed. This tower of confirmation would be built upon the conduct of Codling, who, before the crew took to the boat, made the signal of a ship in distress, upon which some of the look-out boats, which always surround the different coasts of England, immediately came up. This, however, was somewhat too soon to answer the capt.'s purpose; because the skill and intrepidity of these assistant mariners would, no doubt, at that time, have effectually saved the ship. He and the mate got into the vessel again, broad trimmed the sails, and put the helm about, as it endeavoured to steer it into port. When the Brighton boats came along side, Codling desired them to keep off, saying, the ship was his, that he would stick to it to the last, and that they must not come on board before he left it; that it was in vain to do any thing, for the vessel must go to the bottom. He would leave it to the intelligent jury he was addressing, whether this was the conduct of a man who thought himself in danger, and who wished to preserve either the vessel or the cargo? A govt cutter then came up, which assuming more authority, endeavoured to get the ship, then on her broadside, to rights, by throwing a hawser on her; but their efforts were in vain, and she went to the bottom. After the vessel was cast away, or destroyed in the manner

just described, the crew repaired to Brighton, and put up at the Old Ship Tavern. The news soon reached London, and suspicion of foul play arising, Mr. Douglas, an intelligent gent. was dispatched by the underwriters to Brighton, where Easterby and M'Farlane had arrived before him. It was evident, he said, that if Cooper had thus scuttled the vessel without the knowledge and the direction of the capt. the latter would have remained at Brighton to have superintended things upon the spot. Instead of this, however, Read took a place for him in the stage, under the assumed name of Postardo; and on his arrival in London, he wrote back to Read, that, pursuant to his orders, he was going to Colchester to seek for the packet, or byeb-boat, or even a collier, in which he might leave the kingdom, and proceed to Hamburgh. By the activity and vigilance of Mr. Levie, this letter was intercepted, and Mr. Douglas, in order to trace Codling, proceeded to Harwich, but could hear no account of any such name. He then took a boat and went in pursuit of the packet, but on overtaking it, could learn of no such man as Codling on board. He, however, heard of a Mr. Postgate, no longer Postardo, who, on being produced, turned out to be the very identical man he was in quest of. If all these facts were made out, and it should also be proved that the rest of the crew were not suffered by the capt. to go down while Cooper was busy in making the holes, he knew not what sort of clarity even could make the jury hesitate about the guilt of Codling. They would next have to consider the circumstances which regarded Easterby and M'Farlane, the two owners. The offence charged against them was, their having procured Codling to destroy the ship to the prejudice of the underwriters. Here he conceived abundant proofs would be found in the facts of the cargo itself. This was employed for a particular purpose. The object of the two owners manifestly was to procure such a cargo of goods as would give a colour to their transactions, and enable them to recover. Upon this cargo they had actually insured to the amount of £,9000, and attempted, in various places, insurances as high as £,13,000. In order to recover from the underwriters, it was necessary that the invoices should be produced, and the liberal conduct prevailing between the gentlemen at Lloyd's and the merchant of London, made the production of these invoices generally sufficient; but where suspicion was excited, the bills of lading must necessarily be brought forward. In this instance, the two proprietors procured fabricated invoices, charging the goods at 50 or 40 per cent. above their real value. Codling was involved in these bills of lading, which he signed, though he must have known perfectly well that the goods were never on board. He also passed his caskets at the custom-house, and got a manifest on the inventory of goods, which to his knowledge were taken out by Easterby; but, supposing Codling to be entirely out of the case, the two owners were to account for their false certificates. On this subject Mr. Storr's evidence would be very material. If he were asked why, in order to render their fraud more profitable, they had not filled their vessel with merely all lumber, instead of goods, he could assign two reasons for it: 1st, because all the crew could not be entrusted with the secret; and, 2dly, because they expected the vessel might go to Gibraltar, and the capt. from thence furnish two accounts, the one for themselves, and the other, a false one, for the underwriters, which would enable them to sue for a partial loss. It is ever the fate of knavery to have a due proportion of folly mingled with it. Such was the case here; for Brighton, so surrounded by fishing and other boats, was one of the worst places in the world for practising, with success, any villainy of this kind. This was soon felt by Easterby, and impressed by him in a conversation which he thought was not overheard by any other parties but those who were interested, where, in he said to Codling, "You made a d—n'd bungling job of this; why not sink her on the coast of France, from which the boat may go to either shore?" The remark was very just, for had the capt. been cunning enough to have done that on the coast of France which he did at Brighton, no further inquiry could well have taken place, and the underwriters would have of course been defrauded, while the offenders must have escaped with impunity. Easterby then inquired of Cooper whether the hole was of the size of the handle of a carpenter's chisel which lay on the floor in the room? and being answered in the affirmative, he desired to sharpen the end of the handle, that he may plug it so as not to be perceived, should the ship come to land, which there was every appearance of its doing. The next circumstance would shew, beyond contradiction, that Lloyd's coffee-house was the port and market for which the ship was destined; as, no sooner could they get pen and ink, than M'Farlane and Easterby set about making an abandonment. If this had been a fair transaction, none of the crew were entitled to any wages, notwithstanding which they were all paid; and Easterby directed Cooper to come to London, and keep himself close, because, should he be taken, sentence of death would pass upon him. Notwithstanding their cockets, bills of lading, and manifest, yet the goods described in them were not on board, but in M'Farlane's dwelling-house, from which they were conveyed to the lodgings of the sister of a lady who was then connected with him, M'Farlane observing that it would be odd and dangerous if they were found in his house. Easterby staid for some time longer in Brighton, and was, together with Read, examined before a magistrate in the country, by whom they were discharged. After the intercepted letter from Codling, it was thought right that he should be apprehended, and the means he took to avoid it were not those of a man relying on his innocence; for though it would be proved that he remained at the time at home, he was inquired for in vain on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, when he found himself under the necessity of surrendering. He contrasted this behaviour with the conduct of the mate, Cooper, who freely surrendered at his mother's house at Saxmundham, as soon as he had been inquired after. There was an additional circumstance of something more than suspicion in the goods of considerable value found in the dwelling-houses of two of the prisoners. One of the witnesses to this point was certainly a very unwilling one, being a woman connected with M'Farlane, whose evidence they could not have, only she happened not to be his wife. A great part of these goods consisted of silver and plated articles, which Easterby took out and unpacked himself, saying there were other goods to mix with them, after which one debenture was taken for the whole. They were first contained in one large packet, but afterwards divided into five small ones, for the purpose, as Easterby said, of being more conveniently stowed in the lockers. These packages, however, were not found when the wrecked vessel came on shore, and it would be proved to them that Easterby was seen at the ship's side at night conveying them home, and that they were afterwards shipped on board the William, one of his own vessels, for the East Indies. Upon the whole, it would be found that the cargo shipped on board the Adventure was not worth more than £3000 or £4000 at the utmost, though the insurance actually made upon it was £9000, and would have been £13,000, only for some suspicions which arose in the mind of the broker. After having said thus much, when he considered who were the gents. he had the honour to address, he would not attempt to impress upon them how much it was their duty, if after hearing the evidence, any rational doubt should press upon their minds, to let the prisoners have the full benefit of it.

T. Cooper deposed that he entered as a private before the mast on board the Adventure. J. Douglas was at that time mate, and the crew consisted of himself, the capt. the mate, and two boys. Mr. Storrow used to come backward and forward, and sailed with them to Yarmouth. They took in 22 hogsheds of tobacco, some linen, and 12 or 13 tons of ballast, previously to their first sailing to Deal, where they arrived in safety. Douglas quitted the ship there in consequence of being afflicted, as he said, with the rheumatism. Storrow also left it, and was succeeded by Mr. Read, as supercargo. At Deal they took in some cases. Codling offered witness the place of mate, vacant by the absence of Douglas. Witness said, he was not qualified for it, but the capt. replied, that as long as he pleased him that would be enough. They sailed in 5 or 6 days, and had a boat, into which the capt. gave strict orders that nothing should be admitted but 4 oars and plenty of tholes. On the Friday before the vessel was sunk, the capt. said they should not be in the ship 48 hours. On Saturday he further said, that was the last night they should be in her; that he did not think her fit to carry through the bay, adding, "I do not think her life-trusty of my life or yours, and why should she be so of any other man's?" Witness was then on the quarter-deck, and the master at the helm, whom he relieved, and the latter went below. On his return, in about a quarter of an hour, he said to the witness, "Go down, you'll find an auger lying on the cabin floor, which you will carry with you, and after taking up the hatches and scuttle, to get at it more conveniently, you will bore a hole as close as possible to the run." He went accordingly, and found a new auger. With this, he thinks, he bored three holes, and left it behind him, sticking in one of them. The capt. in his opinion, might have got into the place himself, but not so conveniently as he could. When he came on deck, he told what he had done to the capt. who replied, "Very well, let them stand till daylight." On Sunday morning, by order of the capt. the cabin-boy was not allowed to come down and breakfast in the cabin as usual, and he pulled the auger out of the hole in which he left it. The capt. then wanted to find a mawl, to make the holes larger, as they did not seem to let in the water fast enough; when the witness reminding him of the crow-bar, he said, "Aye, that is the very thing." They then went down together, and the capt. lent a hand to fasten down the lockers, that the hole might be enlarged. The witness struck the bar through the bottom, and the water rushed in rapidly. Read was in his bed very near the place where the holes were made, and witness heard him turn himself several times. He might not, however, have heard the boring, as it made little or no noise. Witness called him, and he got up, but returned to bed again before the hole was enlarged with the crow-bar, and though he might not see the hole, he might easily hear the water running in. The smallest hole was kept open, that the ship might seem leaky, and the pumps be kept going. Read was on deck at the precise time the hole was enlarged by means of the crow-bar, and the boys were not permitted to go to bed. The signal of distress was made, and the boat put out before the water came up to the deck. He had packed up his things, and put them into a bread-bag, on Friday, when the capt. said they should not remain on board 48 hours, and at the same time bid him not say any thing about the matter. While the hole was making with the crow-bar the crew were kept close taking in sail, so that they could neither see nor hear what was going forward. Read was up at 8 o'clock in the morning, and several boats surrounded the ship on the appearance of the distress signal. They asked us if we wanted any assistance, saying they were ready to tow us into harbour. The capt. said, the ship belonged to him as long as she could swim, and they had no business with her. He had no doubt but the vessel went down in consequence of the holes that were made in her bottom. Read's trunk was taken on board at Deal, and taken away the next day, together with his bed, the witness helping to remove them into the boat, and they were not brought on board any more. While it was on board, it appeared to be full of linen. When the crew went on shore at Brighton, they repaired to the Old Ship tavern. Easterby and M'Farlane came down there, as he thinks, on Tuesday, and the former asked him where he had bored the hole, and what was the size of it? The prisoner replied he could not exactly tell. He then asked again, whether it was as large as the handle of a carpenter's chisel which lay in the room? And the prisoner answering in the affirmative, or thereabout, he bid him take out the handle and sharpen it, to plug the hole in case the ship should come on shore, which it was then likely to do, as it was driving hard that way. Easterby then said, "Codling is a d—d fool, and has made a bungling job of it; he should have sunk the ship on the coast of France, and as the weather is fine, the boat might have been taken to either shore." Read and Codling were by when these words were spoken, loud enough to be heard by every person present. The two owners then ordered the capt. and witness to go to London together and take private lodgings, telling me that if I did not keep close I should be under sentence of death. Read then gave the witness a note with directions where to find M'Farlane's house in London, after which he received 9 shillings wages, and a guinea to bear his expenses. He came to London in the coach with one of the boys. Read had bespoken places for him and the capt. but the latter being called back by a gent. the boy was sent in his place. The pump had been worked when the water was let in. One of the boys made an observation, on which the capt. bid him go along—that it was only beaung against the run; he, however, at the same time told the witness to go down and see what was the matter, but first joggled and whispered him to say nothing. After being some time at the Dark-house, he walked to his mother's at Saxmundham, in Suffolk, as he began to want money, and failed in his endeavours to get a ship. The next day after his going down, having heard that he was inquired for about sinking a ship, he sent for Mr. Archibottle, the headborough, surrendered to him, and told the whole truth of the story. Cross-examined by Mr. Fielding—he said, he made no doubt of the vessel having sunk in consequence of the holes made in her bottom. He heard in the country that there was 100 guineas offered for his apprehension, but he did not know it while in London, or he would have surrendered himself, and so far from having any notion that the reward would come to him, he gave himself up sooner than any one should have it. He knew that he had done wrong, and repented of his crime. When he was brought to London in a post-chaise, he was examined before the lord mayor, and told the same story he did now. He has been in the compter ever since, and Mr. Levee there. He professed himself very willing to suffer for his offence, if the court thought he deserved it; but, at all events, he was determined to speak nothing but the truth. The ship, he said, was six or seven miles from Brighton at the time the signal of distress was made. He never got any thing by way of reward from capt. Codling, except a new coat; but received no money, or any promise of any.

John Morris sworn.—I was an apprentice to Mr. Storrow, who went as supercargo on board the Adventure. I went on board her when she was in the river. I have seen Mr. Easterby come to the ship, sometimes in the morning, before and after breakfast, and sometimes in the evening. When the packages came, I saw some of them opened, for there were stores for the ship's use; packed up in blue and brown paper; they might be about 14 or 15 lbs. weight. I saw Mr. Easterby again, but I did not see him take any thing away after that time. Then we went to Yarmouth, where some bread, flour, and pease, were taken from the Adventure, to the ship William, which belongs to Mr. Easterby and Mr. M'Farlane, but this was while she was in the river. I know Mr. Blagden, the lighterman, he came to the ship; we went to Yarmouth, and returned to the Downs: Mr. Storrow went as supercargo in the Adventure, but he went out of her in the Downs. G. Kennedy was another apprentice to Mr. Storrow, as well as me: Mr. Read came in the place of Mr. Storrow in the Downs: Mr. Read brought with him a bag, a trunk, and a small bale of goods; when we sailed from the Downs, it was 3 or 4 days afterwards before we came to Brighton: I recollect the night before the ship sunk. I was cabin-boy, and generally prepared breakfast. The chief part of my duty was in the cabin. On Sunday, when the ship sunk, Mr. Codling, my master, sent me for his great coat: it was about 10 o'clock, to the best of my knowledge; the coat was in one of the cabin-lockers, which were then all safe and entire. The ceiling was also, to the best of my knowledge, entire. I got the great coat,

I took it up the hatches of the scuttle, and I heard the water rushing in; then I told Mr. Codling, that I thought there was a leak there; Mr. Codling said there was no such thing, and sent me forward to the fore part of the ship: we had one of the pumps going then: there were two pumps on board the ship: about 4 or 5 o'clock I went to the other pump, for I knew where the gears of the pumps were. G. Kennedy, my fellow-apprentice, was told by one of the crew to fetch the gear of the pump, and he was going for it, but Mr. Codling hauled him up, as he had got a step down the companion ladder. The water was then gaining very fast upon us. I generally breakfasted in the cabin, after my master had done, but that morning I had my breakfast upon the deck. I did not attend my master that morning; he said the mate would do all that was wanting. The mate handed me my breakfast that morning upon the deck. We had a crow-bar on the aft-deck: it was taken from that place to the cabin: I did not go down to the cabin after the crow-bar was taken there: I did offer to go down for the breakfast, but Mr. Codling prevented me; he said the mate would do all that was necessary. We kept pumping at last with the two pumps. After we had all got into the boat, except the mate and the capt. the capt. hoisted the flag of distress while we were along-side. We had been pumping I dare say 3 or 4 hours. The water was gaining upon us very fast before the signal was hoisted. Boats came from Brighton to our assistance—when they came they said “they would take care of the ship,” and the capt. said, they had no business with the ship until he had given her up: that they had no business to take her, for he had not done with her. They said they would take her in tow, and engage to tow her in. The custom-house cutter came afterwards; the capt. would not let them take her, until the custom-house cutter came: when she came, the vessel righted, and then went down, only her top-gallant-mast being above water. When the cutter came, Mr. Read said, he wished she might sink, for that otherwise the thieves would plunder her—he meant by thieves, the people in the boat: we all got on shore together in the cutter—was 2 or 3 days on shore at the Ship inn. Mr. M'Farlane said, that one of us must go up to London, and the other was to stay. He said this about 7 o'clock; I did not know that Kennedy was to go in the morning. Mr. M'Farlane came, and said that Kennedy was to go away. Mr. Codling came first to our room, and then Mr. M'Farlane came and said that one of us was to go to London. I did not go with Kennedy to the coach; I went about 9 o'clock in the morning that Mr. Codling ordered the coach for me.

John Lacey sworn.—I shipped myself at Deal on board the Adventure, two days after she left the Downs. A 8 o'clock in the morning of the Sunday, we came to Brighton; T. Cooper was her mate; he slept at the forecabin. On the Saturday night, Cooper, instead of being at his berth in the forecabin, was backwards and forwards in the cabin with capt. Codling. I was of the captain's watch; I went aft to take the helm, as I usually did; the capt. said, that he would keep it, and employed me in taking in the top-gallant sails, and hauling in the gib. I remember the pump being tried, for we made more water than usual. I saw the new chisel which the capt. brought from Deal. When I had sounded the well, I found an auger there. When we hoisted our flag, several vessels came and asked the capt. if they should take her in tow? They said it was a shocking thing, and asked the captain if they should take her in tow? The capt. said, “keep off, I have not done with her yet.” This was after we had all quitted the vessel. She was then upon her beam ends. The Swallow packet came, and then the capt. gave her up.

E. Storrow examined.—I have been acquainted with Mr. Easterby 17 or 18 years, when I became apprentice to him; I have sailed in his employment as master of a vessel; he made application to me to sail in the ship Adventure, in May last. I had undertaken to become supercargo in the ship Adventure; I had, occasionally, conversations with Mr. Easterby, and Mr. M'Farlane, who was present at a conversation which took place a few days before the ship sailed. To the best of my recollection, it was about 3 weeks before the ship sailed; it was in the parlour, at Mr. Easterby's house, in Canada-wharf. He said that he had no doubt many ships had been sunk, and might be, and the underwriters taken in for the money. The conversation then was on the possibility of such things being done. This was after they had applied to me to attend on board the ship. I had a conversation, 3 or 4 days before the ship sailed, with Mr. Easterby: I did not dine with him, but went after dinner; I found Codling, Easterby, and M'Farlane together. In general, Mr. Easterby spoke: he said, he wished the ship to proceed from London to Yarmouth, and from Yarmouth to Gibraltar, there to sell the whole cargo, either by private contract or public sale; after this was done, he thought the opportunity might be taken, in the Mediterranean, to sink the ship, and the people might take to the boats and get ashore, and one half of the bills of the proceeds of the cargo might be stated in private letters, and the other half in public letters, in order that those which were called public letters, should be shewn to the underwriters as the proceeds of the whole, when in fact it was only half, in order to obtain the amount of the insurance for the whole, and the supercargo was to do this, when I was understood to be the supercargo: this was all in the presence of the capt. Codling and Mr. M'Farlane. M'Farlane said, occasionally, that such a thing might do. Codling was then the master engaged for the voyage, he mixt occasionally in the conversation, and supposed it might do: the cargo, or a great part of it, I understood at that time, to have been shipped in the Adventure. I never meant to proceed in the ship from the first engagement: my reason for appearing to comply, was to endeavour to have some former accounts between Mr. Easterby and me settled. I went in the ship from Gravesend as supercargo: I had the invoices from Mr. Easterby, and I delivered them back to Mr. Easterby at Deal. I wrote to Easterby from Yarmouth, and told him I did not mean to sail from thence in the ship. I afterwards went to the Downs, and saw Easterby at the inn, there I finally quitted the ship, and delivered up the invoices to Easterby, at Deal.

Capt. Douglas examined.—I got to Brighton on the 10th of Aug. I saw the ship Adventure there; only a part of her mast was above water. I went to her; I went again on shore, and saw Mr. M'Farlane, Mr. Easterby, and Mr. Read. I shewed them the authority I had from the underwriters to inquire how the ship sunk, and said, it was necessary to detain the capt. and the crew for the purpose of assisting me to get her on shore to save the cargo: but I mentioned no other reason at the time. Mr. Read took his watch out of his pocket, said it was part of the cargo, and offered to resign it to me, saying, he had no right to it, for it was part of the property of the underwriters. I then went with Mr. Smith, when it was endeavoured to get the ship up by the boatmen, and others who lived at Brighton; they worked at it the whole day, and I came on shore, and remained at Brighton the rest of the day, taking notice of what they were about with the vessel, but took no active part myself. On the Wednesday morning I went to the place where the stage-coaches go off, and I saw M'Farlane and Read walking together: they informed me that capt. Codling was going to London in the stage: I expressed my astonishment at their permitting him to go, after what had passed the day before: Easterby then said that he would detain him, which he did, and sent one of the boys in his place. Easterby, myself, and Read, then walked together to the other ship. Mr. Read said, he had some watches and some time-pieces, and a small bale, which he wished to give up to me. I met capt. Codling, at the inn, and told him, it was very wrong to attempt to leave Brighton, until the fate of the vessel was known. He said he had no place for sleeping—and was obliged to lie on the floor. Mr. Easterby said it would be a great expence to him to continue there. I said I would bear the expence on behalf of the underwriters; and, with respect to his not getting a bed, I would endeavour to get him one at the White Horse. Mr. Codling said "Very well." The ship was, at that time, on her way, getting to shore; but she was not got to the shore, until the Thursday morning, about ten o'clock. I went on board the ship; I saw the holes that were made in the scuttle, from the outside; I was the first who went into the cabin after she was brought to shore. On going in, I found the lower part of the larboard side of the cabin knocked down, and part of the ceiling torn up. There was a hole, which appeared to be done with a rude instrument; it was about 9 inches long, and 4 broad. I did not then perceive other holes in the ship: on the following day, I perceived two auger holes also on the larboard side. The hole made with the rude instrument was quite sufficient to sink the vessel, and I have no doubt she was sunk by it. I saw Easterby and Read after I had seen the condition of the ship; I went with them to Lewes, where they were examined before a magistrate. I said to Mr. Easterby that he had acted very imprudently in leaving Codling to quit the place. I do not recollect that Read was present then; Mr. Easterby said he thought there was no harm in it; he was only gone to London, and meant to return the following day. On Friday Mr. Levie came down to Brighton, and then Easterby was gone; it was after we had been before the magistrate, by whom Easterby was discharged, and Read admitted to bail. It was on Friday night that Easterby left Brighton. I then went to Easterby's lodgings, and there I found some letters. I told Read, and believe Easterby was present at the time, that I thought the ship had been sunk; he said, he had not the least doubt of it: but he did not say by whom he thought it had been sunk. I afterwards went to Harwich, and applied to the postmaster there, to see the names of the persons in the packets, but I did not see the name of Codling. The packet was under weigh, going to the Continent. I got a warrant to search the packets, and pursued them. I got on board the first packet and searched: I found he was not there. I then went on board the other packet, and found Codling in a bed with his coat off, and the rest of his cloaths on. He was searched. I took him into custody and brought him home.

R. Brewer, examined.—"I am a shipwright at Shoreham; I assisted in bringing the vessel into Shoreham harbour, after she had sunk off Brighton. On getting her to the beach, I observed the water to run out of her in three places below the water-mark:—Here the augers found in the ship were produced, as was also the part of the plank of the ship cut out for the purpose, exhibiting the large hole which had been staved in and described by the witness.—The witness proceeded.—"Any one may see that this hole was made from the inside of the ship, for it is torn, and it is larger on the outside than it is on the inside.—The ship received no injury in towing in, for we plugged her; neither was she pillaged, for we guarded her: she was brought into Shoreham harbour.—Lord Ellenborough.—Q. "Was she destroyed as a vessel for the purposes of navigation, until she had those holes plugged up?" A. "Yes, my lord, she was certainly."—In the course of the cross-examination of those witnesses who spoke to facts affecting Read, some circumstances rather favourable to that prisoner transpired. A body of evidence was adduced with respect to the contents of the cargo, its nature, quantity, and value. Some evidence was also adduced, respecting the facts of taking away a part of the cargo from the vessels; from which it appeared 12 cases were taken away by direction of Mr. Easterby; this was while the vessel lay in the river. The principal witness, with whom this part of the case rested, described that a whole heap of things, chiefly inclosed in cases, were taken out; there were 2 boat loads. He described the part which Easterby took in this transaction. Perry, the officer, described a number of articles which he found at M'Farlane's house, and also in the house of a Mrs. Smith, who was the sister of a Mrs. Patterson, a woman connected with M'Farlane, Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Patterson were also brought forward; they spoke to the removal of the articles in question from the house of Mr. M'Farlane to the lodgings of Mrs. Patterson, &c. The latter alleged that the causes of her removing the goods were her apprehensions from a servant maid who was in the house, and also in consequence of the bankruptcy; and she also spoke as to the identity of the goods removed by her from M'Farlane's, and those taken to the police-office.

On the prisoners being called on for their defence, a short discussion arose, in consequence of some objections offered by Mr. Fielding in behalf of Read. He contended that there was no satisfactory evidence that any act performed by him was done to prejudice the underwriters, and without such an intention being established, the charge of felony could not attach. He had no conception of any equivalent proof that could be substituted in failure of the above. He also referred to the case as affecting Codling, in which, he conceived, there was not an atom of sufficient evidence.—The Id chief just. expressed his opinion, that that consideration was matter for the jury and himself, and seemed to say, in the case of Codling, that if there was no intent to prejudice the underwriters, there were no pretensions to sustain the indictment.—In behalf of Ready it was contended that he had no concern with the navigation of the vessel; nor had he any controul over the capt. or the officers of the ship; and that a person, situated as he was, was horn in the contemplation of the act of parliament; his latter of attorney differed from the generality of those which went to appoint super-cargoes; and the favourable points in his case were also strongly adverted to.—Mr. Farlane and Easterby being called upon; the former, in addition to his leaving it to his counsel, said, he had a number of gentlemen in court, ready to depose to his character; and observed, that he had been in his majesty's service 28 years. Easterby confided his defence to his counsel.—Mr. Erskine then addressed the court, in a speech of considerable length. He professed his agreement with much of what had fallen from the learned counsel, who had previously offered objections to the observations of the noble and learned judge thereon; but he directed his arguments in favour of his client chiefly, if not solely, upon an important consideration of law; he contended by a fair construction of the practice of the law hitherto, and the relevant acts of parliament, the court of admiralty had no jurisdiction over such a case as Easterby's appeared in the evidence for the prosecution. He observed much on the strictness with which the law of England requires local jurisdictions to be observed. He described the leading provisions of the statute of Hen. VIII. which was framed for the better regulation of these; those were, however, in some points of view so strict, that a felony partly committed in one county and partly in another, could not be punished. Under that interpretation of the law, the heinous crime of murder would also go unpunished: so would a case where an accessory after the fact, committed the offence in another county, as the charge could not be venued, as in such case a jury of county A. could not take cognizance of what happened in county B. Such were the effects of strict locality of jurisdiction. He referred to the statute of W. III. as affecting that of H. VIII. in such a case as the present; and these objections, he contended most emphatically, applied to Easterby's case. The particular act in question, however, was that of the 11th G. I. c. 29, which especially provided, that if any owner, capt. or officer, &c. of a ship, shall willfully cast away, burn, or destroy the same, &c. he committed upon the bearing of the evidence on such a charge, but principally contended that as the part which the evidence went to attach to Easterby, such as the directing, procuring, &c. must have been committed on the land, or without the jurisdiction of the admiralty, his case could not be cognizable by the court which he addressed. The act of H. VIII. required such an offence to be tried by the court of admiralty, which could only be done when the offence was committed at sea: but there was no evidence of Easterby's having been on the sea at all, or even that he was on board the ship: pressing this line of argument for some time, the learned counsel contended his client could not be touched as an accessory until this important question of the jurisdiction was decided. Mr. Garrow replied with great ability to the arguments of the counsel on the other side. He seemed to refer to the opinion of the court; and in concluding expressed his opinion, that if this court had no jurisdiction of such an offence, no other had. The jett of the lord chief justice's observations upon the arguments of counsel was, that he thought the cases may be properly referred for a special consideration. After a few observations between Messrs. Erskine and Garrow, and the Bench, it seemed to be his lordship's determination that the point should be referred for the opinion of the twelve judges.

Lord Ellenborough then entered upon his charge to the jury, which took up more than two hours in delivery. The jury then brought in the following verdict: Codling, guilty; M'Farlane, guilty; Easterby, guilty; Read, not guilty. Codling immediately received sentence of death. Judgment upon M'Farlane and Easterby was respite, their cases being reserved for the opinion of the judges.

KING'S BENCH.—Knighly and others v. Rogers.

Oct. 30.—This was upon a policy of insurance upon the ship Wentworth, at and from Jamaica to London, and the question and issue was, whether the ship was sea-worthy at the time when she began her voyage? It appeared by the evidence of the captain, and from the log-book, that the 2nd day after she was at sea, she made a great deal of water, although she sustained nothing more than the usual breezes upon that coast. But the capt. said there was a large rat-hole, which might occasion her to ship a great deal of water. This hole appeared to him to have been just eaten through, and as the ship heeled with the wind, it was below the water-mark. He thought that the hole might be nearly eaten through, and perhaps not quite, until they got to sea. They put back in consequence of the water in the ship, and upon unloading her she was surveyed. He admitted that she wanted some repairs, but he did not agree in the judgment of the other surveyors; who thought she could not safely proceed without a degree of repairs that would have been more expensive than the ship was worth. Had he known the state of the ship to be such as it appeared upon the survey, he certainly would not have ventured to sea with her without some repairs. The mate gave the same account of her. Mr. Erskine, for the underwriters, stated, that he should shew this ship to be in a most deplorable state, and totally unseaworthy at the time of her sailing. He accordingly called caps. Domat, Levit, and Wilson, and they agreed in stating, that in many of her most material timbers, she was so rotten that they could gripe out handful like clay or mud: that her seams were all open; and that between the planks and the stern, they could have inserted 2½ inch rope. They also concurred in opinion, that these defects could not have arisen during her stay in the W. Indies. Lord Ellenborough thought the evidence of these gents. was conclusive. Mr. Gibbs submitted, as a point of law, that if she was sea-worthy when the policy attached, and that, unknown to the assured, she became otherwise in the course of her stay, it was a risk insured against. One of the jury said, they were of opinion that she was rotten before she left England, which Mr. Gibbs admitted put an end to his case. Verdict for defendants.

The King v. Shutland.

Nov. 15.—Mr. Serj. Cockell moved the judgment of the court on the defendant, J. Shutland. Lord Ellenborough read the report of the trial which took place before his lordship at the last assizes for the county of York. It was an indictment for a libel contained in a letter written by the defendant to J. Ratcliff, esq. one of the justices of the peace for the county of York, reflecting on the character of Rich. H. Beaumont, esq. of Whiby-hall, and a justice of the peace in the said county, imputing to him that he had repeatedly given in fraudulent returns to the commissioners under the income bill, of the state of his income, by which, in one year, the revenue had been defrauded of upwards of £100, he having stated his income more than £1000 per annum less than the reality, which was 5500 a-year at least. In another year, that he had defrauded the rev. of upwards of £76, by another false return, for which he made an excuse that he had made up his account in a hurry, at a distance from home, but which was not true. That the defendant was an engineer, employed, among others, by Mr. Beaumont, and assisted in making up his account of his income, and became well acquainted with his income; and being called upon by the commissioners to state what he knew, he sent this letter to Mr. Ratcliff, one of the commissioners, and a particular friend of Mr. Beaumont, in consequence of which investigations took place; Mr. Beaumont was surcharged by the commissioners, in some of which surcharges Mr. Beaumont acquiesced. The letter, in which this libel was contained, was written with a good deal of severity against Mr. Beaumont, and marked by many intemperate expressions. Upon which the prosecutor, Mr. Beaumont, preferred his bill of indictment against the defendant, and removed it out of the court of quarter-sessions to the court of king's bench, and the case was tried before my lord Ellenborough, at the last assizes for the county of York, when the proof consisted of the letter being delivered to Mr. Ratcliff, and of its being of the hand-writing of the defendant who was therefore found guilty. Mr. Park now produced affidavits on behalf of the defendant, by which it appeared that Mr. Beaumont had actually given in false accounts of his income to the commissioners; and that once, after Mr. Beaumont and the defendant had been making up an account of Mr. B.'s income, and laid it before the commissioners, for the trouble in assisting at which Mr. B. gave the defendant two guineas, Mr. B. said to the defendant, it was well the commissioners did not know of the £3000 he had received for the last three years for timber he had sold, for if they did, they would play the devil with him. Another affidavit, of a gentleman of the name of Ingiam, stated, that Mr. Beaumont had expressed a great deal of malice against the defendant, saying if he could find a hole in his coat, he would take care to tear it, if it was to cost him £1000, or even £10,000; that he was a scoundrel, &c. Mr. Park accused the prosecutor with having shewn more malice than that of which he complained in the conduct of the defendant. He had not come forward to the court for its interference, by way of criminal information, which he would have been entitled to, if his complaint was just, because he was a magistrate for the county of York—Why did he not? because he knew that what the defendant had said of him, in that letter, was true, and he could not deny it; and he knew also, that the court would not grant him leave to file a criminal information, unless he denied, upon his oath, the truth of that which was imputed to him. He did not bring his action, which was the best way of vindicating his character: Why? because, in that case, the defendant would have been entitled, and he would have been able, to justify what he had said, by proving the truth of it. He did not appear as a witness upon the trial of this indictment, although by law he was competent: Why? because he knew that upon his cross-examination, it would appear, that the substance of the defendant's letter was true. So that the judgment of the court would have been merely nominal. He therefore contented himself with merely proving the hand-writing of the defendant; and he knew very well, that in an indictment, the truth of the allegations made against him could not be offered in evidence. He did not even now come forward with any affidavit upon this subject. Why? he knew he could not make any affidavit that could be of any use to his case, without denying the truth of the charge made against him by the defendant; and because he knew that, if he had denied it, he would have been indicted for perjury. He did not come forward in this business, because he dared not. The prosecutor had disgraced himself by this prosecution. As to the defendant, he was, to be sure, chargeable with some little intemperance in the manner in which he had written this letter, but he had suffered more than enough for that by the harassing course, as well as the expence of this prosecution. The defendant was so far from being culpable, that the public were much indebted to him for bringing forward a gross fraud upon the public revenue; so that when the whole matter was considered, he had no doubt that their lordships would consider the justice of this case satisfied, after pronouncing on the defendant a nominal judgment.

Mr. Justice Grose proceeded to pronounce the judgment of the court, and said to the defendant, that he had been convicted of having published a libel, for which he was now to receive the sentence of this court; which libel was a reflection on the character of R. H. Beaumont, esq. a magistrate of the county of York. In administering the penal justice of this court, they were not only to look to the probable consequences to the public, from the publication of a libel, but likewise to consider the private motives of the individual who brought the matter before the public.—The court could not but feel concern that such scenes had been laid before it as appeared upon the affidavits in this case, in which a gent. of fortune called on the court to inflict punishment on an individual who he said had injured his character. It was impossible for the court not to see, that the motive for instituting this prosecution was not a love of public justice, but founded on one of those passions which degraded the human character; when the court said that this prosecution originated in private malice, it was impossible for the court to do more or less than to pronounce upon the defendant the following sentence: that he, the said John Shutland, for the offence he had committed, do pay to the king a fine of six shillings and eight-pence, and that he be committed to the custody of the marshal of the court until such fine be paid. Defendant then paid the fine and withdrew.

Collett v. Lord Keith.

Before Sir Simon Le Blanc and a special jury, Nov. 20.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff against lord Keith, for detaining his ship the Argonaut, at the Cape of Good Hope, at the time the French squadrons were expected to attack that place, in consequence of which detention the ship and her cargo were entirely lost. The defence of lord Keith was, that as commander in chief of the Brit. squadron, he thought it his duty to seize and detain the Argonaut, although she was an American neutral ship, in consequence of his suspecting her to be carrying on a secret communication with the enemy. The cause has been tried several times before. It again occupied the whole day, and the jury gave their verdict for the plaintiff, subject to a reference to a Mr. Inglis, a merchant of London.

The King v. Philip Hamlin.

Nov. 22.—The attorney-general moved the judgment of the court on the defendant, who had suffered judgment to pass by default, to an information filed against him, stating, that one Andrew Hill, late of the town and burgh of Plymouth, on the 30th of Oct. held a certain office of trust and confidence under our said lord the king, that of landing surveyor of the customs of the port of Plymouth, and that the said Andrew Hill died, whereby the said office became vacant, and was in the disposal of the lords commissioners of the treasury; that the rt hon. H. Addington was the first in the letters patent in such commission, and in a place of high trust and confidence, and likewise a privy councillor of our said lord the king. That the defendant, with intent to seduce the said H. Addington from the duties attached to such high station and office, to cause the said Hamlin to be appointed to the office of landing surveyor of the customs of the port of Plymouth, so vacant, for the corrupt lucre of gain, did write, and cause to be sent to the said H. Addington, a certain letter, offering a pecuniary reward to be paid to the said H. Addington, as follows:

“ Sir—This day a place became vacant by the death of Mr. A. Hill, landing surveyor of the customs here: if you can procure that place for me, for my own use and benefit, I will give you 2000*l*. and also give a bond to keep the business a secret. Your answer will oblige, your's, &c.
PHILIP HAMLIN.

The affidavit of the defendant stated, that he sincerely repented of having sent this letter, for which he was unfeignedly sorry, and threw himself on the mercy of the court: that he is 40 years of age, and carries on the trade and business of a tinman, by which alone he supports himself and family, and then expressing an apprehension that a severe judgment may be the ruin of himself and family; that had he been appointed to the office, it was his intention to have performed the duties of it faithfully, and then the affidavit refers to his general good character with his neighbours. The two rev. ministers of the two parishes in Plymouth, and several merchants and others of the town of Plymouth, made affidavits, that, excepting this instance, they knew of no blot in the character of the defendant, but that, on the contrary, it was a very respectable and good one. The attorney-general—“ Your lordships are fully possessed of the nature of this case, from the information that has been read, and on which I have but a very few words to say. The defendant by suffering judgment to pass against him by default, has confessed the guilt of having attempted to bribe an officer of high council, by the transmission of a letter to Mr. Addington, offering to him £2000, provided he could procure him an office then vacant in the customs. That a compliance with this proposal would have been a scandalous and disgraceful act in the individual to whom it was made, and a serious and aggravated breach of trust and official duty, and as such a great misdemeanour, cannot be doubted; as little can it be doubted, that the insult, thus offered to a person of such high station, is a very grave and serious misdemeanour. My lords, I think it is due to the age and country in which we live, to state, what indeed is universally believed, that there never was a period in the history of this country, or of any other, in which the characters of persons in an exalted station of public life, were so free from all suspicion of this species of offence, as the present moment, and that there is no character who stands in the public eye, more free from the chance of even the worst, or the most malignant enemy, insinuating such an offence against him, or whose known integrity of character proves him incapable of such a meanness more than that of the rt hon. gent. who was thus insulted by the defendant, nor any one that stands higher in public estimation at the present moment. I think I may say that the person thus addressed by the defendant, has, in every sense, too fair a fame, and too exalted a reputation in the world, to render it necessary for him to take notice of this matter on his own account, and therefore he might, with perfect security, as far as his own character was interested, have treated this letter with contempt and flung it into the fire. But a man of his exalted station must shew, that it is not private feeling, but public justice, must be the guide of his conduct. He feels, therefore, my lords, that for the sake of public example, this case should come before you for your consideration. My lords, I have had communicated to me the affidavits which have been read to the court in mitigation of punishment; and in which the character of the defendant appears to stand well among his neighbours. The circumstances which he discloses respecting his own situation in life and of his family, are all of them topics very well adapted to affecting the private feelings of individuals, and as far as that consideration goes, nothing further need be said; but there would have been no prosecution in this case at all, on the ground of personal feeling; it was set on foot on grounds of a public nature, and the spirit in which the prosecution originated, still remains; it is, therefore, submitted to your lordships, not on a point of individual feeling, but of public justice, in which case your lordships will consider how far the affidavits ought to operate in mitigation of punishment. Mr. Erskine, on behalf of the defendant, subscribed to every word that was uttered by the attorney-general in his address to the court. He said, that the defendant must feel gratitude for that address. He subscribed to the observation, that the rt hon. gent. to whom this letter was addressed, might very well, as far as his own personal reputation was concerned, have put this letter into the fire. It was written with great ignorance. It was an absurd, insolent, and he must add a criminal letter. But the moment that this most unfortunate, and very ignorant person, became aware of the impropriety of what he had done, he wrote to Mr. Addington another letter, full of contrition for what he had done; but Mr. A. could not pass the matter by—it was necessary for public purposes to institute this prosecution; and Mr. E. presented his client to the court, as a man acting under a cloud of ignorance. He was a tinman, at Plymouth, so long accustomed to the noise of his own hammer, that he thought every thing in this world was to be brought to and knocked down by the hammer. He observed that the defendant's character was attested by the two rev. gent. of the parishes in Plymouth, as well as by other reputable men there, and they came forward, in his behalf, on an accusation which would naturally have induced them to hold back, if they had not been thoroughly convinced of the real worth of the defendant's general character. Lord Ellenborough—Let him be committed, and brought up on the last day of the term. Mr. Erskine—My lords, to shew the simplicity and ignorance of this unhappy man, I would state, that when the information came down, and the process was shewn to him, commanding him to appear and answer, he thought, on seeing the red seal of the process, that he had got his place. Defendant committed.

The King v. Hamlin. (Nov. 29.)—The attorney-general moved the judgment of the court on the defendant. Mr. Justice Grose spoke nearly as follows:—"Philip Hamlin, you stand to receive the judgment of this court, charged by an information, in which you are accused of having attempted to corrupt the honourable H. Addington, offering a bribe to the said H. Addington, to nominate and appoint you to the office of landing surveyor of the customs of the port of Plymouth, being an office of great public trust and confidence then vacant, and that, to induce him so to appoint you to such office, you wrote and caused to be written, to the said H. Addington, a letter, offering to him £2000 for so doing. You suffered judgment to pass against you by default. Such a practice, if permitted, would lead to mischief incalculable, for it might extend to every office in the appointment of the great ministers of the state, civil, military and ecclesiastical, and would supersede men of ability and integrity, and place in their stead the ignorant and corrupt. If the punishment we are about to inflict on you will not entirely check this practice, punishment still more severe must be resorted to. This court, for this your offence doth order and adjudge, that you pay to the king a fine of 100*l*.; that you be imprisoned in the custody of the marshal of the marshalsea of this court, for three calendar months, and that you be further imprisoned until such fine be paid."

COMMON PLEAS. Earl St. Vincent v. Lord Nelson.

(Nov. 25.)—The important and long-pending cause between earl St. Vincent and lord Nelson, respecting prize money was decided this day. Lord St. Vincent was appointed to the command of the fleet stationed off the coast of Spain; but his health requiring a short absence from the squadron, he obtained permission to return to England, on leaving his command to the next flag officer. His lordship, previous to his departure, gave orders to capt. Digby, of the Alcmene, to cruise within the limits of the station; then deputed his command to lord Keith, sailed for England in the Argo. From lord Keith, the command devolved upon lord Nelson, who became and continued senior admiral on that station until the return of lord Keith; in the interval, capt. Digby captured two Spanish ships of war; and lord Nelson, as commander in chief, claimed his share of the prize-money. The proclamation of 1797, on which the question of his lordship's right greatly depended, directs that a certain proportion of prize-money should be divided among the flag officers, and that one-eighth should belong to the commander in chief: but the 4th art. of the said proclamation ordered, that if the chief flag officer returned home, he should not be entitled to any share of the prize-money obtained by the ship under other command. The proclamation also provided, that when a flag officer was appointed to the command of a fleet, he should not be entitled to any share of the prize-money, till he actually arrived within the limits of the station. On this ground, therefore, lord Nelson laid claim to one eighth of the prizes captured by the Alcmene. As two of the learned judges were on the opposite side, the judgment of the court had nearly been withheld, but as judgment was prayed, on the part of lord Nelson, Mr. Justice Heath withdrew; consequently the decision of the court was in favour of earl St. Vincent.

KING'S BENCH.—Moore v. Durnford.—Crim. Con.

Dec. 10.—This was an action against the defendant for crim. con. with the plaintiff's wife. The damages were laid at £10,000. Mr. Erskine was counsel for the plaintiff. After a few general remarks upon the clearness of the case and the impossibility of setting up any defence to the action, he proceeded to state that Mr. Moore was a gentleman of large fortune and high character. Some years ago he had paid addresses to his present wife. This lady was of one of the first families of the kingdom, being niece to the earl of Menth. Her beauty and accomplishments were equal to her birth, and a virtuous education had adorned her with innocence and modesty. Mr. M. succeeded in his addresses; and his fondest hopes of domestic happiness were realized. She was the mother of three children, the eldest 14, the second 11, and the youngest 4 or 5 years of age. It was fit he should say, that during the long course of the plaintiff and his wife living together, to the date of this criminal connection, the plaintiff had no reason to doubt her chastity or honour; on the contrary it was impossible for him to establish the fact of any adultery having been committed under his roof. For some months before her elopement her husband observed a difference in her behaviour, an unusual degree of coolness, but without being able to discover the cause. Previous to this time the defendant frequently visited at the plaintiff's house, but there appeared no particular intimacy between him and plaintiff's wife, that could justify the least suspicion. Mrs. M. had first become acquainted with the defendant at a public breakfast given by the latter. The defendant was considered as a man of character, and therefore the plaintiff had not the slightest idea of his attempting any thing dishonourable, but the incense he offered at the shrine of his wife's beauty and accomplishments, won her to his love, and she became too affectionately attached to him for her future happiness. Her fatal passion was the cause of her deserting her house, and abandoning her husband, her friends, family, and children. The plaintiff was for some time unable to discover the place of her retreat; but at last he found her living with the defendant, and was enabled to procure that proof which would now be laid before the jury. The marriage being proved, three gentlemen were called, who fully confirmed the learned counsel in what he said of Mrs. M. before she was married, and of the happy state in which she and her husband afterwards lived. The next witness was a maid servant, who had seen Mrs. M. with the defendant after her elopement; she said that she had made up one bed for them in the defendant's house at Brockhill, and that she had no doubt they slept there together.

Mr. Garrow, leading counsel for the defendant, confined himself to saying a few words in mitigation of damages. Capt. Durnford, though called capt. was only a subaltern in the guards, and depended entirely upon his pay. Heavy damages would ruin him for life. He was a very young man, and had been betrayed into this indiscretion only by his youth. Lord Ellenborough—It has been properly suggested that cases of criminal conversation are of various complexions, and capable of various degrees of aggravation. In the present there does not appear to me to have been any plan of seduction laid by the plaintiff. The lady, from some reason or other, went away from her husband, and lived in lodgings at Acton before any act of adultery was alleged. There was no evidence to prove, that he had seduced her to leave her husband's house, although he had visited her there three times. At Brockhill they certainly lived under circumstances which rendered it fair to conclude that a criminal intercourse had taken place. In the absence of all evidence I do not see that you ought to fix her seduction upon the defendant. As he met her after she had quitted her husband, it is possible that compassion for her situation, on hearing that for his sake she had fled from her family, might in some degree influence his conduct. That he is liable for damages there can be no doubt, as he has set his seal on the husband's dishonour, and for ever rendered it impossible for him to receive his wife again. Verdict for the plaintiff, damages £1000.

COMMON PLEAS.—Corder v. Emerton.

Dec. 10.—Serj. Best opened this case on the part of the plaintiff. He said the security of commerce in a great measure depended on the good faith and integrity of those, by whose recommendation we were introduced to new connections. In a country like this, where three fourths of the inhabitants were engaged in trade, and its existence almost depended on mutual confidence; no tendency could be more fatal than the false representations made of one tradesman to another: and if the evidence he was going to submit was believed, a more infamous or fraudulent scheme could never be concerted. The plaintiff, Mr. Corder, was an eminent corn-factor, in the city of London; and the defendant a country dealer in the neighbourhood of Oxford. About the latter end of Dec. 1801, the defendant, with a person of the name of Hall, came to the plaintiff's stand in the corn market, and purchased some malt and beans by sample. Mr. Corder being unacquainted with Hall, made some hesitation; wherein the defendant introduced himself by saying, that he had formerly recommended a customer of the name of Thompson; "True," said Mr. Corder, "and I had a great difficulty in getting my money of him. I hope you have brought me a better chap now." The defendant replied, that Hall was a good man, and would pay for what he bought; though at the same time he knew Hall was insolvent, and the sole intent of this bargain was to recover the sum of £50 which he owed to the defendant. It was agreed, that on the Friday following, a bill for £139, the amount of the corn, should be sent to Mr. Molyneux, of Foster-street, Bishopgate, who would accept it. In the mean time the corn was got out of the plaintiff's hands, and carried on board a barge at Brooke's wharf, to be conveyed to Oxford. When the bill was presented to Mr. Molyneux for acceptance, he denied any knowledge of the transaction, or of the parties. The plaintiff, suspecting a fraud, sent an order to the wharf, to detain the corn, but it was too late. The barge was arrested in its course, near Abingdon, by the ice; Emerton soon after came up, and obtained the corn. The facts above stated were proved by the evidence of Hall, who was brought up by a writ of habeas corpus from the King's Bench. He also stated, that he was prevailed on by the defendant to come to London for the purpose of obtaining this property, and that Emerton had threatened to arrest him for his debt. The jury, without hesitation, found a verdict for the plaintiff, for £139, and interest from the date of the transaction.

Gill v. Hogg.

Dec. 22.—This action was brought against the defendant for enticing away the plaintiff's wife and children from their home, against the will and without the knowledge of the plaintiff. Serjeant Cockell said, the plaintiff was clerk to Messrs. Willis and Co. and the defendant to Messrs. Matland and Co. both bankers in this city. They were also related. Mr and Mrs. Gill were married in 1795, and lived together in harmony for a considerable time. A short period before Mrs. G.'s elopement, the same cordiality did not exist; but what must have been the sensations of the husband on returning home to find his wife and children fled? Three months elapsed before he learnt any tidings of them, and in that period he was almost driven to madness. After considerable enquiries without effect, two of the plaintiff's friends passing accidentally through Hoxton, saw the name of Hogg on a door, and concluded, that Mrs. Gill might have taken refuge there; when they knocked at the door their suspicions were confirmed by seeing the servant who had formerly lived with the plaintiff, but she denied Mrs. G. being there. The friends went to the next house, and there saw Mrs. G. from a window. On this information the plaintiff commenced an action for crim. con.; and at the time of serving the writ, demanded his wife and children. The defendant was reproached with his treachery; but, being conscious of his innocence in this respect, insisted on calling down his sister, who had been the constant companion of Mrs. G.'s bed. The plaintiff felt some degree of satisfaction at this, having at first suspected his wife's fidelity, and the action assumed its present form. Mrs. G. was intreated to return to her home, but refused; the children, however, were delivered up, and conveyed to the house of a friend. A short time after, a reconciliation was effected, and they now lived on terms of amity and concord. The learned serjeant said, that a man who harboured the wife of another, without the knowledge or consent of her husband, whatever might be his motives, could not be justified. Mrs. Wardell, mother-in-law of the plaintiff, alleged, that some difference had existed between them about two years ago; that Mrs. G. signified an intention of leaving her husband in consequence of his ill-treatment, which the mother endeavoured to prevent, by stating what might ensue. This conversation took place in the presence of the defendant, who said, if Mrs. G. could help herself, she was to blame if she stopped—that he was going to housekeeping, and she should live with him. On the 6th of March last, Mrs. G. called on her mother, and said she was going to her friends in the country, but did not then disclose the place of her retreat. Mr. Stevenson, a friend of the plaintiff's deposed, that five or six weeks previous to the elopement, Mrs. G. applied to him, to request he would intercede with her husband to procure a separate maintenance, to which the witness objected. Serj. Shepherd said, it was important that it should be understood, that men have no right to alienate the wives and children of others; it should also be understood, how far relations or friends, when they perceive that matrimonial intercourse is nothing but misery and discord, are justified in opening their doors to the unfortunate; or whether they were to be deaf to pity and distress, and thrust a wretched woman with her helpless children into the street. The foundation of this action was, that the defendant had seduced the plaintiff's wife from her home; but by some means it was possible to judge from the record, what was the intention of the parties. This case rested on the testimony of Mrs. Wardell; and if her story was believed, it must be inferred that G. and his wife lived in harmony, till the latter was seduced by the defendant: but could it be supposed that a man should seduce a woman for no other purpose than the satisfaction of supporting her? For, from the first hour of her elopement to the present time, his conduct had borne the strictest scrutiny; and could be attributed to no other motive than a benevolent wish to afford shelter to an unfortunate woman, whom he knew to have just cause to be dissatisfied with the treatment of her husband. The defendant certainly had placed himself in a situation of great danger---a situation in which the slander of the world would say, his charity and benevolence had been extended to the enjoyment of her person. There were other circumstances in this case which proved that the defendant's conduct was purely charitable. He had declared his intention to support his cousin as long as he possessed the means; an assertion that did honour to his heart; and it was to be hoped the determination of the jury would not tell him that he should have barred his door against her; that unless she returned to her husband, she must starve, or get her bread in a way which shocked the feelings of humanity.

Lord Alvanley said he was extremely desirous, from the nature of this cause, that the jury should determine some line by which a man might regulate his conduct in receiving the wife of another. In his opinion, the defendant certainly did not merit the aspersions which had been cast upon him, though it would have been more prudent, if he had acted with greater caution. The jury were to consider, whether the defendant had seduced the plaintiff's wife, with any sinister motives, in which case the damages could not be too heavy; but if, on the other hand, they conceived that she had just cause to leave her husband, and the defendant merely afforded her protection, the damages could not be too small, if any.

Verdict for the defendant.

KING'S BENCH.—Tenant v. Slater.

Dec. 23.—This was an action brought by Mr. Tenant against the defendants Messrs. Slater and Co. for having infringed his patent, obtained for the exercise of his invention of a method of using calcareous earths, the earths of strontes and barites, all of them either in their carbonated or calcined states, but more properly in the latter state, instead of alkaline substances for neutralizing the oxygenated muriatic acid used in bleaching, instead of pot and pearl-ashes, kelp, barilla, or other alkaline substances. In one word, the plaintiff claimed, in support of his patent, the merit of having first discovered the use of lime and lime-water, with oxygenated marine gas, united in a fluid for the purposes of bleaching; and the single question was, whether the plaintiff was or was not the inventor of this compound, and the first who applied it to use? It appeared, that the practice of using this fluid for the purposes of bleaching, was a very great advantage to trade; so much, indeed, as that one house in the north of England had saved £2600 a-year by its use, and that it bleached better than the former mode, and did not discharge the colours, which the old mode often did. The patent was dated on the 30th Jan. 1798, and therefore, if this practice had been in use before that time, the plaintiff could not sustain his patent. It appeared on the evidence of Mr. Hall, that his firm, consisting of himself and two partners, whose business was carried on by the help of two servants, used this very compound for the purposes of bleaching, precisely as the plaintiff claimed the exclusive right of doing; and that they had continually done so ever since the year 1791. P. Pilkinton, the foreman of Mr. Greatrix of Dishley, in the hire, a calico-printer, proved that he had constantly used the very same compound, in the very same manner as the plaintiff claimed the exclusive right of doing, and that they had done so in the firm ever since the year 1796. Hugh Foy proved, that he was the instructor of the plaintiff, and that the first hint of uniting lime-water with gas, in the manner here done, was given to the plaintiff by him, and that on that instruction the plaintiff made the experiment, and it answered all expectation, on which the teacher said to the plaintiff, jocularly, he would have a patent for this: the plaintiff said, "No, the improvement is yours, the invention is yours, and you should have the merit of it." Some time afterwards the patent was taken out. The jury informed the chief justice, that they were satisfied, and wished to hear no more of this, unless his lordship thought it necessary. Lord Ellenborough—I am indeed satisfied; I have been fully and painfully satisfied upon this subject for some hours, and the reason why I waited so long to say so, was to give you time to say when you had made up your minds upon the case. I might indeed have non-suited the plaintiff hours ago, because the patent itself is much too large, for it claims by its terms, a monopoly of almost all bleaching. It is a scandalous patent, as destitute of merit upon the facts as it is unfounded upon law. I never heard evidence more satisfactory than that of Pilkinton. When I was attorney-general, I had occasion to see men come for patents, who had actually stolen the invention from the author, who came afterwards to apply for it. Plaintiff nonsuited.

Lingham v. Hunt.—Crim. Con.

Dec. 24.—This was an action for crim. con. of the defendant with the plaintiff's wife.

M. Garrow opened the case. The plaintiff complained of the defendant, that he had debauched his wife. The present case he stated as the most aggravated that ever came into a court of justice, and would call on the justice of the jury to go the full length they were warranted to go, which was £5000. This defendant was the friend, and confident companion of the plaintiff, and while he was thus professing that friendship, debauched the plaintiff's wife. When he had succeeded in debauching, or perhaps when he had not completed his object, but had reason to hope he soon should, he looked about him how he was to fence against justice, and generally he persuaded the victim of his lust to be instrumental in shewing something against the character of the plaintiff.

Something known only to herself and some domestics, and this was to be made up into negligence in the husband, so that he was not to be entitled to damages in a court of justice. The plaintiff's wife was now under what the defendant called his protection, but the truth was, that she lived with him in the most degraded state that a woman can be in, having lost her virtue, and with it, of course, her character; and, therefore, she was driven by dire necessity to embark in the iniquity of the defendant, and enter on one common cause with him. He should now proceed to show how these parties came together. The plaintiff was a very young man, and in partnership with a gentleman of the name of Hopley, in the trade of a wine merchant. He was married on the 16th of Aug. 1800, to the lady whose misconduct with the defendant formed the subject of inquiry to-day. She was only 18 years of age when married, but extremely handsome and well accomplished. They lived near to the defendant, who is engaged in the same line of trade, who was also at that time married to a very amiable and most deserving lady. Accordingly, as Mr. L. and Mr. H. were intimate, Mrs. H. and Mrs. L. became friendly also, and visited each other frequently. Soon afterwards Mrs. H. died in child-bed, the infant surviving. On this occasion Mr. H. conducted himself as a man should, with great tenderness to the infant, and apparent sorrow for the loss of its mother. Left thus, without the protection of the mother, it became necessary to find out somebody to take care that all servants, and those who had the charge of nursing the infant, should not neglect their duty, and Mrs. L. took upon herself this kind office. It was in this state that the defendant meditated the diabolical plan of seducing the plaintiff's wife, of which the plaintiff had not the least reason to be jealous, for the two families had been in the constant habit of visiting each other, nor was there the least diminution in the affection of Mrs. L. to her husband; but, to his astonishment, on the 8th of July last, when Mr. L. who had been attending the concerns of the day, in his business, came home, he found his wife was not there. The evening having advanced, he hoped she might be at her father's. He sent; she was not there. He sent to some other of her relations, but no tidings could be had of her; at last he concluded that she had gone to the house of some friend. As the night advanced, he thought a thousand things that might have befallen his wife, but had no idea that his own confidential friend had induced her to elope with him, to the dishonour of all the family, and ruin of herself. The jury should guess his astonishment when he received a letter from the defendant, by which guilt would appear in its true light. The letter was as follows: "Sir,—With 'sorrow, great, how can I announce to you, you 'have most miserably misplaced in me your confidence; your wife cannot return but with your forgiveness, which is impossible. I think, I see; however, the situation of my poor brother, who, as well as Eliza, yourself, and myself, must go 'distracted. Still yours, JOS. HUNT."

Mr. Garrow proceeded to detail the rest of the case. That about ten o'clock at night on the 8th of July last, the defendant prevailed on the plaintiff's wife to go with him in an hackney-coach to Windmill-street, where he took a post-chaise, and having delivered two letters to the proprietor of the chaise, directing him to send them immediately to the city, went off to Barnet, arrived at the Green Man Inn that night, and there he and Mrs. L. slept in one bed, and had lived in adultery ever since.

Miss F. Merchant.—"I am perfectly well acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. L.; they appeared to me to be living very happily together."

B. Waters.—"I know the plaintiff perfectly well. Mr. Lingham behaved towards his wife in every respect as an exemplary husband. I remember Mrs. L. saying something about their separation in the night of illumination, but nothing about a tavern; but that she and a gent. had supped together, and had fared better than the rest of the company, who were obliged to put up with what they could get at a pastry-cook's."

Mr. Dixon, brother to the plaintiff's wife.—"I was one of the party who went to see the illumination: there were twenty of us nearly. We missed part of our company when we came to M. Otto's. Mrs. L. was under the care of Mr. H. and one of my sisters and Mrs. Lingham's sister were under the care of Mr. Lingham. We separated before we came to M. Otto's, at Mr. Hope's house, from whence we went to M. Otto's, and afterwards we went to a pastry-cook's, and then came home."

Mr. Newman, the stable-keeper in Windmill-street, and his two boys, proved that Mr. H. and Mrs. L. came to his house, in a hackney-coach, on the 8th of July, about half after ten, and took a post-chaise to go to Barnet. That Mr. H. gave to Mr. Bailly two letters, directed to persons in the city, and which were delivered the following morning at six o'clock, the one of them to the plaintiff's father by mistake, who delivered it immediately afterwards to the plaintiff; the other to the defendant's brother.

Sarah Limel, chamber-maid at the Green Man at Barnet, proved that the defendant and the plaintiff's wife arrived at the inn about half after one o'clock, where they supped, and then went to bed, and slept in one bed all night. That a gent. came and asked for Mr. H. the next morning, and the chamber-maid went up, when she saw the lady in bed.

It then appeared, that Mr. H. and Mrs. L. called at the house of Mrs. L.'s, laundress at Holloway, and there took change of clothes.

Mr. Erskine made a long and very eloquent speech. Admitted that his client could not be justified in what he did; yet he maintained that there were shades innumerable in this offence. Where a man had violated all the rules of hospitality, and had been a deliberate seducer, he deserved every scourge that could be inflicted on him in a court of justice; but where he had been exposed to a blaze of beauty, without that sort of caution from the husband, who was the natural guardian of the honour of the wife, and where the husband had been remiss and negligent as to the safety of the wife, and had permitted her, young, beautiful, gay, and lively, to be too often unheeded and alone in the company of the defendant; and where a man, under such circumstances, had not been proof against so much temptation, he was the object of the compassion of men of feeling, nor should he be rigorously treated in a court of justice. The parties were all of them objects of great compassion. He did not justify the defendant, for most assuredly his conduct was criminal; but he submitted that it was not the conduct of an hardened offender, but of one whose sorrow and repentance accompanied his transgression. This was to be inferred from the letter he wrote to the plaintiff: but it would appear that the plaintiff had repeatedly been admonished of the impropriety of allowing his wife and the defendant to be so much together; but that he had been careless notwithstanding; had suffered them to go out riding together, and instead of accompanying them, had gone a fishing, &c. and had, under pretence of taking care of his wife, sent an infant with her and the plaintiff on their excursions. When they came home, he had only complained that they were late, and said, his wife should not stay out so late. That he lived opposite to the house of the defendant; and that after the defendant and the plaintiff's wife had come into the defendant's house, after they had been out all day together, he had sent for the keys to get what he wanted for himself, and left his wife with the defendant at supper, where they were together until 11 at night. That on the night of the illumination for the peace, a large party went out together from Tower-street. The plaintiff, instead of taking care of his wife, allowed that charge to be taken by the defendant, he taking another lady under his arm. That when they came to the house of M. Otto, they separated, when the plaintiff shewed no anxiety about his wife, while some of the company went to seek for them. That the defendant and the plaintiff's wife supped together, and that at a tavern. That above all, the plaintiff's wife told him that she had supped at a tavern with the defendant, who treated the matter with rail-lery, or badinage, as one of the witnesses described it. He concluded with observing, that where the plaintiff had been so negligent, and claimed damages in a civil action, for the loss of that, to preserve which it was his duty to be careful, he should not take advantage of his own negligence, and obtain large damages against the man who, next to himself, had been most unfortunate.

Mr. C. Hunt, examined by Mr. Gibbs.—“I am the brother of the defendant: was not very much in the habits of intercourse with him; I had had a difference with him, that difference took place on account of this transaction: I was one of the party who went to see the illuminations: I went with the party from Tower-street: Mr. and Mrs. L. were of the party, which was about 20 in number, my brother was one of them; he had the care of Mrs. L. and she took his arm; Mr. Lingham was walking alone, and flinging crackers about the ladies. Mr. L. did not express any apprehension, but seemed very careless. When we got home inquiry was made for Mrs. L. but she was not returned. We got home between two and three. I do not know when Mrs. L. came home. Afterwards, and on the first of May, I saw Mr. L. and a party was proposed for Mrs. L. that day. I was at tea with Mrs. L. and some ladies. Mr. L. came to the room: Mrs. L. said to Mr. L. that Mr. H. had desired her to take a ride the next day with him in his chaise. I observed to Mr. L. he had better borrow my brother's other horse to go with them; Mr. L. declined, saying that he was going a fishing. Mrs. L. did go out with my brother the next day; Mr. L. did not accompany them, but went a fishing. I remember Mr. H. and Mrs. L. returning that evening; they came to my brother's about eight in the evening; while they were there Mr. L. sent for a certain key.”—Chief Justice.—Q. To Mrs. L.? A. To Mrs. L.; she sent it; she said to supper, and after supper till eleven at night. Mr. L. was invited, but did not come over. At another time, when Mr. Lingham was present, there was some conversation concerning what passed on the night of the illumination. Mrs. L. observed, that she had been at a tavern with my brother, and had some beef and a cool tankard. Mr. L. observed, that they had fared better than we had, for that we had been obliged to put up with a pastry cook's shop. All he said as he went along was, “Do you know where Mrs. L. is?” I said “No, I do not, I have not been home this afternoon.” Mr. L. observed, going along, he did not like Mrs. L. being so much at our house. I inquired of the servant, at my brother's house, where Mrs. L. was? I learnt that she had been there that afternoon, but had gone with Mr. H. a-riding in his chaise. I asked Mr. L. to walk up stairs, and take a game of cribbage with me till they should return. Some time after dark, between nine and ten o'clock, they returned; the chaise came to Mr. L.'s door; Mr. L. helped Mrs. L. out of the chaise, and observed to my brother, that he should not suffer him again to keep Mrs. L. out so late, or after dark. When we were at cribbage, I told him I thought it was very improper for my brother to keep Mrs. L. out so late, and that I should not suffer it if I were him.—Anne Atwood had lived servant with Mr. and Mrs. L. four months. Q. Did you ever in your life see a more affectionate husband than your master? A. Never in my life.

Mr. Garrow replied with great rage at the conduct of the defendant in this most infamous transaction. He felt not the least scruple in saying, that the defendant's brother had endeavoured to support his cause by direct and absolute perjury. He protested that he never saw so iniquitous a case as that attempted to be set up by the defendant in the whole course of his life.

Lord Ellenborough observed, that this case deserved their most serious attention. The plaintiff by this action complained that the defendant, by the seduction of the plaintiff's wife, had deprived him of all the happiness and all the honour which marriage brought to him in social life. It appeared that the defendant had the implicit confidence of the plaintiff—he had betrayed it—nor could any one use stronger language against the defendant than he had used himself; for he said, “you have most miserably reposed in me your confidence.” Had the defendant felt that contrition he expected the court to believe, he might either have suffered judgment to have past against him by default, or come into court by counsel, with humble instructions to watch the proof on the part of the plaintiff, and trusted to the discreet observations which his counsel would have made, and in which he would not have been disappointed. His lordship then reprobated the idea of supposing that a man gives up the virtue of his wife, so as to lose his right to claim damages for adultery, merely because he had suffered his wife to lay hold of the arm of another in a crowd at an illumination. This was too profligate even for this immoral age, so prone to seek excuses for adultery. His lordship concluded with observing, that upon the evidence nothing appeared against the plaintiff, for his case was satisfactorily made out, and that nothing occurred to his mind that could shield the defendant from making as full and ample a compensation to the plaintiff as the jury in their opinion of justice, should be disposed to make.

The jury, in less than one minute, gave a verdict for the plaintiff. Damages, £5000.

LIST of the MEMBERS returned to serve in the second PARLIAMENT, of the UNITED KINGDOM.

(* * Those marked thus (*) were not in the last Parliament. Those marked thus (†) are new for the respective places. All the rest are re-elected. The figure after the name shews in how many Parliaments the Member has served. Those marked thus (§) are returned for more than one place.)

Substance of Mr. Wilberforce's Address to the Freeholders of the County of York, on being proposed as one of the Members.

Gent.—In appearing before you upon the present occasion, I cannot but feel that I am placed in a serious, and I might almost say, an awful situation; for I am come before you to render up an account of the trust which six years ago your kindness committed to me; and when I consider the weight and importance of that trust, under any circumstances, and still more when I reflect on the very critical and portentous times during which I have possessed it, which have tended to multiply its difficulties and increase its responsibility, it is natural for me to feel that I am in a grave and solemn situation, now that I stand before you to answer to you for the discharge of its various and weighty duties. I will fairly own to you also, Gent., that there is another consideration which powerfully affects my mind; I mean the prodigious size of our vast county: its population, its wealth, and all those other circumstances by which it is distinguished. I know indeed that it is constitutional language to affirm, that a member of parliament for any place, be it what it may, is, when chosen, the representative, not of his own particular constituents, but of the people of England in general: that the member for Old Sarum is a member of parliament equally with the member for the very county in which we stand.—This is an opinion which, in the main, I myself hold: it is sound constitutional doctrine, which I maintain, and which on this day I publicly avow: but yet, gentlemen, he must have a mind of greater power of practical abstraction than mine, or have firmer nerves than I possess, who, when the rights, the interests, the credit, the character, the honour of this great county, (itself a little KINGDOM) are committed to his care, does not feel himself loaded with a burthen far more weighty than that which he would have to bear, if he were the representative of some decayed town or some inconsiderable borough.

Gent. I trust I may appear before you with boldness, because though conscious of many errors and imperfections, I can truly declare, that I have acted with honest and pure intentions, with a mind unbiassed by personal considerations or party motives; with a sincere desire of promoting the welfare of our common country—I have not made the sacred trust which you confided to me, subservient to the purposes of my own interest or aggrandizement.

Gent. I trust I may also affirm, that I have not been inattentive to the local concerns and particular interests of my constituents.—Chiefly indeed owing to a weak constitution, which after the labours of a session of parliament requires to be restored by medical attention, and recruited by rest and quiet, partly from various other causes, I have been less personally present among you than it was my wish to be, but I have trusted that you would prefer the solid substance of diligent attention to your public and private concerns, before those petty personal assiduities in which they must needs abound, who by them would compensate for the scanty performance of more important duties.—Gent. it is natural for me, in meeting you in this place, and giving, as it were, an account of my stewardship, to cast my eye backward upon the leading events which have happened since we were last assembled here upon the same occasion. We have lived in times fruitful, in events the most important and extraordinary, in times abounding also in difficulties which have often rendered the path of duty the object of serious, difficult, and painful inquiry. Allow me here to mention one consideration which often tends to mislead others on this head, and to make them think the difficulty of forming a right judgment in political questions to be less than it really is. Not seldom it happens, that honestly desirous of doing our duty, we meditate with seriousness, we inquire with diligence; we weigh with close attention; and after all, when we have long poised the balance, and watched it with a wary and impartial eye, we are scarcely able to make out to our own satisfaction which of the two scales preponderates: yet when at length we declare our opinion, thus slowly and painfully formed, we are apt to speak with confidence and positiveness, as if there were no doubt to be entertained on the point in question. This difficulty of judging aright in the complicated cases which come before us, should teach those who think differently on political subjects, mutual moderation and candour. We cannot expect that even our constituents should approve of every particular of our conduct. They may indeed, and ought to require, that their representative should agree with them in the great principles of political conduct, and likewise in the general line to be pursued in any given conjuncture of affairs. But provided there be this general agreement, they ought not too scrupulously to look for an exact coincidence in every individual vote, and on every particular question.—Gent. I heartily rejoice to find that you approve of these principles, they are principles worthy of the rank you hold, and of the place you fill in our national representation. They send your member to parliament the free and liberal representative of a free people, and not your slave, fettered and shackled, a character which I should feel degrading, though it were to be the slave even of the county of York itself.—Gent. when last I met you in this place, we were in circumstances of great public danger. The prospect shortly after became more gloomy, and the danger more imminent; yet, even these dangers, great as they were, appear but small, compared with the number and magnitude of those to which we were exposed about the beginning of the very last year: then, added to a new and powerful confederacy, formed among the northern states, against the very sources of our maritime strength; added to the entire defection of our allies, and the union of almost all the powers of Europe against us, under the guidance of our inveterate enemy, France, which having forced the power of Austria to sue for peace in the posture of a suppliant, was enabled to direct against us the whole undivided strength of her vast empire, was superadded rebellion, but ill extinguished, in our sister kingdom, and an apparent spirit of disunion in our public councils. But through the wisdom, integrity, firmness, and dignified moderation of His Majesty's late and present administration, supported by the steady and liberal aid of parliament, under the blessing of a gracious Providence, the black cloud which lowered over us has been dissipated, and we are restored to a state far more prosperous and promising. True, indeed, there has been a dreadful expenditure of blood and treasure. The vessel of the state has suffered severely in the conflict, and has entered the harbour with her canvas torn; but in the war of elements which we have witnessed, how can it be but that she must have suffered? I trust, however, that we are still in a situation in which we may continue a great and a happy people.

Gent.—I trust it will be our future policy to abstain, as far as possible, from those continental connexions, for which I had almost said the very integrity and good faith of the ministers and people of this country, render us unfit, inasmuch as we cannot keep or break our engagements accordingly as it suits the convenience of the present moment in the fluctuating state of human affairs.

We shall, I trust, cultivate our own internal resources, and endeavour to render our people secure, prosperous, and contented. I am happy to declare to you, gent. that the character of His Majesty's present administration, and the tenor of their past conduct, firm and temperate, but yet conciliating and unassuming, is a pledge for their continuing to act with the same honest and faithful attention to the true interests of their country. These gent. are at least my principles, and it is fit that you should know them. Conscious of upright intentions, yet when I consider the serious, important, and complicated duties of the situation for which I presume to propose myself, I should feel afraid to venture on the task, were I not also supported by the assured persuasion, founded in long and uniform experience, of the candour, or rather kindness, with which you judge the conduct and construe the motives of your representative.

After having been unanimously elected, Mr. Wilberforce spoke in substance as follows:

Gent.—I will trespass on your patience for a very few moments, but I should be unfaithful to my own feelings, if I were not to express to you the grateful sense which I entertain of your great and continued kindness. I cannot but feel it deeply. I have not made the sacred trust, which you confided to me, subservient to the purposes of my own interest or aggrandizement. I see also in its true point of elevation the exalted station to which your favourable opinion has again raised me. Suffer me in truth to say, (a sentiment, the avowal of which, remarks that have been elsewhere made may render not improper) that I consider the honour of being your representative as one of the highest dignities I could enjoy. Great is my respect for hereditary honours. It is still greater for those which have been granted by the well-judging hand of our Sovereign, for brilliant exploits rendered to the Public by our great naval and military commanders, or for long and faithful services in public offices of high trust and laborious duty. But he must have a mind constituted very differently from mine; his estimate of things must be formed on very different principles; who could account as more honourable that nobility which should be granted from motives of political interest or personal favour, than the dignified and exalted station to which he is elevated, who, by the free and united voice of the freeholders of Yorkshire, is elected to be the depository of their interests, and the guardian of their rights.—The pleasure which I feel cannot but be heightened, as indeed the honour is increased, by beholding around me, so many of the same faces which I have been used to see on similar occasions, and by the testimony I thereby receive of their continued friendship and esteem.—Gent. the scene in which we are now present, is indeed a magnificent spectacle; to see the freeholders of this great county assembled together, and freely choosing their own representatives in parliament, is a sight in the highest degree gratifying and animating to those who know the real nature and the high value of true liberty: of that liberty, which, as was so well stated by my friend beside me, whom it is a pleasure to me to be again able to call my colleague, is founded in law, inseparably connected with public order.—Let those deluded men, whether of this or of any other country, who have so far mistaken the real spirit of liberty, as to confound it with anarchy, come hither and have their error corrected, and learn to know and admire that true image of constitutional freedom which is here exhibited. This is a lesson which it becomes this great county to give. Yes, gentlemen, it will become you, that as you constitute the county first in extent, in wealth, in population, in agricultural labours and commercial manufacturing industry, so that you should be first and foremost also in that which is still more excellent and elevated, in that political independence, which constitutes the very spirit and soul of all your constitutional and legal rights—Suffer me, gentlemen, likewise to dwell upon another consideration, which is naturally suggested to my mind by the very appearance of the company that I see around me—I mean that harmony and perfect union between the landed and commercial interests, which has so long subsisted in this county, to their mutual honour.—Here again, gentlemen, it gratifies the mind, to see, that to all its other circumstances of honourable distinction, our county superadds the dignified exemption, from that low and degrading jealousy, which in other times and places has too much prevailed. You well know, that your real interests are the same, that you must stand or fall together.—Gentlemen, preserve and cherish this just and liberal sentiment; it is suitable to your character; it is the pledge of your independence. If ever any persons could presume upon being able to impose on you a member not the real object of your choice, it would be by sowing among you a principle of disunion, by endeavouring to make you mutually jealous of each other, thus bringing you both into subjection. These little jealousies may better accord with inconsiderable rights and petty interests; but they suit not the unquestionable reality and extended bulk of the agriculture and commerce of our great county.—Gent.—I have laid before you the sentiments with which I am impressed; I shall return to parliament with a heart devoted to your service, and desirous of demonstrating, by a faithful and assiduous discharge of the duties of my station, the warmth of my gratitude and the sincerity of my attachment.

The Addresses of Thos. Wm. Coke, Esq. M.P. to the Gent. Clergy, and Freeholders of the County of Norfolk.

Gent.—My heart is glowing with the warmest and most unfeigned gratitude, while I thank you for the zeal which you have manifested in my favour, and congratulate you upon the success of a cause, which is equally dear to you and myself.—Professions, unaccompanied by actions, may sometimes amuse the credulous, and sometimes conciliate the unfriendly. But in every appeal which I make to your judgment, and upon every occasion upon which I solicit your support, I can, without any consciousness of presumption, challenge the strictest enquiry into the rectitude of my motives, and the consistency of my conduct.—It has, indeed, been my lot to be engaged in your service, at a very trying and perilous crisis; when the unusual state of public affairs required unusual circumspection and steadiness in public men; when the best and wisest of our fellow-subjects were exposed to unmerited and unexampled contumely; when independence was misconstrued into disloyalty, and patriotism was branded with the odious name of faction. But no reproaches, however poignant—no artifices, however subtle—no menaces, however clamorous, were sufficient to shake the firmness of my soul, or to deter me from discharging those duties which I owed to my constituents and to my countrymen, as the guardian of their ancient and sacred rights. Under the serious conviction that peace and freedom are sorer preservatives of civilization and good order, and surer effects, too, of morality and religion, than war with all its triumphs, or oppression, under any of its disguises, I disclaimed to become the dupe of prejudice, or the tool of power.—Amidst the fears of many who were vicious, and the apostasy of far too many who were venal, I reflected again and again upon the pure, the temperate, and salutary principles of the English constitution.—I continued to revere those principles—I have endeavoured to act up to them, and therefore I throw myself, without dismay, on the justice of every enlightened, impartial, and uncorrupt observer, who glories in the name of a free-born Englishman.—The protection which I have lately received from you, and by which you have rescued our common cause from the assaults of a sudden and most formidable opposition, is equally honourable to yourselves and to me. It shews, that amidst all the struggles of party, and all the stratagems of misrepresentation, your favourable opinion of my integrity is unchanged, and that the increased difficulties with which you were to contend, have only produced a proportionate increase of ardour and energy in behalf of a representative, who has never sacrificed your interests to promote his own—never deceived you by promises which he was unwilling to fulfil—not stooped to the mean and mischievous practice of gratifying ambition at the expense of sincerity or consistency.—In the rank, the opulence, the well-known connexions, and long-tried honour of many respectable men, who have stood forth as my supporters in the present contest, my country has received a most unequivocal pledge of their conviction, that the measures I have uniformly and avowedly pursued, are not at variance with the true spirit of the constitution, nor injurious to public security and public prosperity.—It is with peculiar satisfaction, and even pride, that I acknowledge the active and disinterested assistance which has been given me by the yeomanry of this county,—a class of men, whose pursuits are eminently useful in every civilized community,—whose character has in many periods of our history been distinguished by a firm and heroic spirit of independence, and upon whose growing wealth, number, and strength, I am accustomed to reflect with the most heart-felt joy. Such, indeed, is my respect for the soundness of their understandings, and the manliness of their sentiments; and such, too, is my sense of their importance to the well-being of society itself, that in watching over their rights, and contributing to their happiness, I shall ever consider myself as performing one of the most pleasing and momentous duties, by which a member of parliament can either do credit to the choice of his constituents, or provide for the substantial and permanent advantage of his country. It is not unknown to you, that a large portion of my own time and attention has been employed upon subjects of agriculture; and therefore I gladly embrace the opportunity which is now afforded me, of declaring to you and to the Public, that the most splendid distinctions of title or station are, in my judgment, of little or no value, when compared with the esteem and attachment of an English yeomanry, neither enervated by luxury, nor seduced by corruption.—You will permit me, gentlemen, to express my earnest hope, that in adhering to the cause of Sir Jacob Astley, as my colleague, I was justified by the steadiness which I had observed in his parliamentary conduct, by the concern which I felt for his injured character, and by the respect which I owe, in common with yourselves, to the memory of his late father—the faithful and favourite representative of your county, and, you will give me leave to add, a most sincere and constant friend to myself and my family.—Gentlemen, I once more thank you for your generous and spirited exertions in my favour: I feel in them a solemn and imperious call upon my gratitude and my honour, to prove myself not unworthy of your support, and most anxiously do I hope, that by a diligent and conscientious discharge of the trust which you have reposed in me, I shall to the latest hour of my life, retain the confidence of this large, opulent, and independent county.—I have the honour to be,

 &c. &c. T. W. Coke.

To the Gent. Clergy, and Freeholders of the County of Norfolk.

Gent.—Permit me to congratulate you upon the termination of the scrutiny which Col. Wodehouse professedly demanded in compliance with the wishes of his friends, and of which he has openly declared to you his “warmest approbation.” How far the zeal of his advisers was accompanied by knowledge and discretion, must be left to the consideration of those, who may long have reason to remember, that a majority in favour of Sir Jacob Astley, which upon the poll amounted to ninety-five, has now reached one hundred and nine, after the strenuous efforts that were made to reduce it for the space of twenty days.—I am not rash, Gent. in stating, that if the time had allowed every objectionable vote upon every side to be fairly and fully examined, the superiority of Sir Jacob Astley would, in all probability, have been greater than it now is; and I confess, that the very unusual proceedings of the sheriff’s court, have ultimately strengthened my confidence in the merits of a cause, which, after a construction of the statute possibly right, a construction possibly wrong, and doubtful assumptions, without any construction at all, has proved victorious.—I cannot, indeed, dissemble the painful regret which I felt, when, for purposes of defence only, my counsel found themselves obliged to adopt the mode of warfare which their adversaries had employed, and thus to dispute to votes of many worthy and respectable freeholders, on the ground of mere informality.—But for severities, which it was not in my power to prevent, the sole responsibility lies, not with the parties who reluctantly engaged in the scrutiny, but with the persons who originally and spontaneously called upon the sheriff to grant it.—Sincere is my sorrow for the loss of time, the vexation of spirit, and other unpleasant effects, which the scrutiny must have occasioned among persons, who are scattered at various distances from Norwich, and whose presence at home must, in this season of harvest, have been peculiarly necessary to the right management of their agricultural concerns. Your good sense, however, will suggest to you, that Sir Jacob Astley and myself are no otherwise answerable for these interruptions, than as men who were compelled to act upon the conditions which their opponents had prescribed to them, and who, by so doing, have eventually established your rights, together with their own.—Your patriotism, at the same time, will find ample compensation for every temporary inconvenience, when you view the result of the scrutiny as a most unequivocal proof of that wisdom and that equity which characterise the laws of England, and by which they are justly endeared to every English heart.—Among other favourable consequences of this event, an opportunity is again afforded me for returning my cordial and respectful thanks to all my constituents—to those who, with a candour and impartiality that will ever command my esteem, supported me jointly with Col. Wodehouse—to those who thought me worthy of the high distinction conferred by a single vote—and to those who, from motives which most deeply interest my best feelings, bestowed their suffrages on Sir Jacob Astley as well as myself.—Many and weighty are the obligations which you laid upon the successful candidates during the election, and which both of us, I trust, will always remember with unfeigned satisfaction, and endeavour at least to repay by unshaken fidelity.—But my particular and most grateful acknowledgments are now due to you, for your dignified generosity in sustaining the expenses of the scrutiny, and for your unwearied activity in facilitating the separation of legal from illegal votes.—The decision made by the sheriff, will, I hope, speedily put an end to all political animosities; and sure I am, that no exertions on my part will be wanting to restore that harmony and mutual good humour which lately prevailed among you, and which it is the glory of a free people to consider as suspended, but not destroyed, by difference of opinion, in the exercise of their common rights for the common good.—As Col. Wodehouse in his address to you, complains of practices, which he describes under the name of “arts,” and such arts, too, “as he would have blushed to see employed in his own behalf.” I am under the necessity of confronting vague and invidious statement with direct and ingenious explanation. In what, then, let me ask, consist the arts so confidently imputed, and so sharply censured? And what are the facts which tend to convict me of having the smallest share in them? Most certainly, I should have been ashamed to insinuate concerning my competitor, as some friends of that competitor have most falsely reported concerning me, that he thinks himself under little or no obligation to those who voted for him singly, or conjointly with myself.—As certainly, I have not wished to call down upon him, as others have wickedly endeavoured to bring it upon me, by ascribing to him indecorums which he never committed, absurdities which he never uttered, and sentiments of illiberality, combined with arrogance, which he is equally incapable with myself of harbouring, even for one moment, in his bosom.—I have not attempted to lull the vigilance of my opponents, or to cheer the hopes of my supporters, by ambiguous and indirect preparations for contest, to be avowed, or explained away, to be pursued or abandoned, to be employed in one quarter, or transferred to another, as experiments, and consultations upon the result of experiment, might require.—I am not indebted for any portion of my success to the apostasy of fickle companions and faithless friends, from the cause of my honourable and much respected rival—I have not let loose a fierce and inquisitorial spirit of detraction, upon the real or supposed faults of my neighbours in private life—I have not degraded a large and opulent county into the situation of a petty and venal borough, by eagerness in issuing peremptory orders for the bribery oath to be administered, without any apparent plea from necessity, and without the ordinary delicacies of discrimination.—I have enticed no man by bribes—I have intimidated no man by menaces; and as to the pretensions of voters who have been precipitately, and, I should think, unhandsonely stiled “impostors,” the scrutiny shews most incontrovertibly, that such pretensions, if such they were, have not been countenanced by me.—Doubtless, in the hurry of a contest so spirited in itself, and so unforeseen by my well-wishers, possible it is, that among those who supported, as well as those who opposed me, several persons have innocently fallen into mistakes about the nature of their property, and the extent of their qualifications.—But my sense of propriety would not have suffered me to charge imposture upon any man, or any bodies of men, unless I were in possession of the clearest proofs; and my long acquaintance with the frank and manly character of the freeholders of Norfolk, abundantly convinces me, that no one class of them deserves to be mentioned in opprobrious terms.—For my part, I am accustomed to honour their zeal, whether the direction it takes be favourable or unfavourable to myself; and I am determined to vindicate their rights, from whatsoever quarter they may be attacked.—I brough away stage of the present contest, it has been my earnest desire to abstain from unpro-woked and unbecoming reproaches towards every man, who, from the honest conviction of his own mind, supported my competitor.—But, when my opponents stand forth as my accusers, they would do well to remember, that so far as my suffrages in parliament, or my influence out of it, could have extended, no husbandman or manufacturer would have been bereaved of the fruits of his honest industry, or dragged from the land of his fathers, to perish in foreign climes; no lovely charities of social life, by which friend is endeared to friend, or neighbour to neighbour, would have been interrupted; no burthensome taxes would have been imposed; no innovations would have been craftily introduced into government; no rigour would have been wantonly exercised without the sanction of law; no altar would have been profaned; no throne would have been endangered; no cottage would have been visited by the forest scourges of heaven, pestilence, famine, and the sword.—Prepared alike against the snares of solicitation, and the din of threats, I disdained to desert in reality, or even appearance, the genuine doctrines of Whiggism.—I found in common sense and common honesty sufficient preservatives for myself, against the contagion of popular panic, and the seduction of high, but in some instances, I fear, corrupt example.—I looked for national honour in national security, for national security in peace, and for peace in the triumphs of wisdom over prejudice, of justice over passion, and of magnanimity over real or pretended fears.—For the rule of my conduct, I have again and again referred you, not to romantic and novel theories, but to those practical and sound principles, which afforded to our ancestors the surest protection for their happiness as men, and their privileges as Englishmen—principles, which acquired, surely, additional authority and additional lustre under the auspices of William III. and which, in succeeding reigns, seem to have been deeply incorporated into the opinions, the habits, and the laws of an enlightened people, who were conscious of having been delivered, without bloodshed, from the perils of civil and religious bondage. By those principles was I enabled to discern the transcendental and characteristic excellence of a constitution, which, like our own, had placed not only the strongest, but the very clearest boundaries, between the use and abuse of power, on the one hand, and between liberty and licentiousness on the other.—To those principles I adhered, not only during the smooth and prosperous flow of public affairs, but amidst those occasional agitations of the public mind, to which every form of government, contrived by human wisdom, but administered by human infirmity, must inevitably be exposed.—From those principles I swerved not, under the multiplied difficulties of two eventful wars.—Guided by those principles, I formerly strove to avert that necessity which severed our American colonies from the mother country, after a profuse expenditure of treasure and of blood. At a later period, I was taught by those principles, to lament and to oppose that system of administration, which, according to the sober and avowed judgment of almost every Englishman, in almost every party, finally left us no other alternative, than a continuance of hostilities, by which England might have been subjected to fresh and grinding taxation, in fresh and unprofitable efforts, or the cessation of them, upon terms, which have given to France increased security from all she has recovered, and increased aggrandisement from all she had acquired.—It is now become my indispensable and most pleasing duty, to employ those principles in diffusing and perpetuating the blessings which Providence has graciously bestowed upon us by the return of peace; and if any deplorable change in the politics of Europe should again bring my country into a state of warfare, I shall again have recourse to the same principles, as the most efficacious means of alleviating its calamities, and shortening its duration.—Surely, he that recommends such principles by precept, or enforces them by example, ought not to be hunted down by rude and savage clamour, as the enemy of civilization—as the disturber of good order—as a Jacobin, who, in the detestable spirit of the crew, and according to the only justifiable use of the word, would plunder his superiors, tyrannize over his countrymen, murder his governors, and blaspheme his God. During the calm of peace there cannot be even the colour of a reason for the repetition of that hideous jargon, which beguiled and exasperated the minds of men in the gloomy and tempestuous season of war.—Far be it from me to condemn in other men that exercise of free and impartial judgment which I have ever asserted for myself. But if any persons there be, who, deaf to the warnings of recent experience, are yet determined to persist in undisguised, undistinguishing, unrelenting hostility to the principles for which I contend, it cannot be improper to remind them, that they may themselves unwarily realise the mischiefs which they loudly deprecate; and eventually become the destroyers, not the preservers, of national strength, consolidated by national union, and invigorated by constitutional liberty.—At such a juncture as the present, it were vain to expect that every freeholder should assent to every opinion, or approve of every measure for which I hold myself responsible to the county, and to the Public.—But I am resolved to deceive no man, be he friendly or adverse to me, though I am aware that by executing that resolution, I may chance to offend in some quarters, where it is impossible for me to please, without the baseness of duplicity or the meanness of cowardice.—Be then assured, gentlemen, that no man living feels more sincere reverence than I do, for loyalty, as a precious and sacred homage due to power, wheresoever power, under the guidance of law, is employed in fostering merit, in protecting innocence, and in dispensing equal justice to every subject of every class. But heaven forbid, that under the disguise, or I should rather say, by the prostitution of this or any other venerable name, I should surrender my independence, or violate my conscience.—That for selfish purposes of venality or ambition, I should be the betrayer, when I had pledged myself to be a guardian of the public weal.—That I should endeavour to decoy others, or suffer myself to be decoyed, into sottish credulity, or abject thralldom.—On the contrary, it is my wish to be esteemed a free and uncorrupt member of parliament, in a free and civilized society, every member of which must have a common interest and a common duty, in quelling the outrages of faction, and watching against the encroachments of oppression.—Reflecting on the magnitude of the trust which you have again reposed in me, I thought myself bounden thus unreservedly and thus seriously to lay before you the fixed sentiments of my soul. I love my country—I am thankful to you my constituents.—and to the latest hour of my existence it will be my constant aim to promote your welfare, and my highest ambition to be honoured by your support. I am, Gent. &c. &c.

T. W. Coke.

Norwich, August 28, 1802.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Nov. 16.—At three the session was opened by the lords named in His Majesty's commission, for that purpose, viz. the Lord Chancellor, his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, and his Grace the Duke of Portland, who took their seats on the occasion, in the usual place under the throne. The concurrence of the House being obtained, the Lord Chancellor commanded the attendance of the Commons by a message by the Black Rod. In a few minutes after, the Commons, to the number of about 160, appeared at the bar, introduced by Sir F. Molyneux, Usher of the Black Rod, and preceded by their senior clerk, Mr. Lee.—The Lord Chancellor then informed both Houses, that His Majesty, finding it inconvenient to attend personally, had issued his commission to certain persons therein named to signify His Majesty's pleasure to them. The commission being read, the Lord Chancellor spoke from his seat nearly as follows:—"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"His Majesty's commissioners are commanded to inform you, that as soon as the members of both Houses are sworn in, His Majesty will communicate to you the causes for which he has required your attendance in the present parliament.—Gent. of the House of Commons, Previous to this, it will be necessary that you should have chosen a Speaker. It is therefore His Majesty's pleasure that you should now retire to the place appointed for you to sit in, and make choice of a fit and proper person to be your Speaker, whom you are to present at the bar of this house at two o'clock to-morrow, to receive His Majesty's approbation."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—As early as the hour of eleven in the morning, the Lord Steward attended in the Privy Chamber, and the members came down to take the oaths.—Before two o'clock a very considerable number of members had entered the house. From that hour it filled very rapidly. At 35 minutes after two, a message was received from the House of Lords, requiring the attendance of the Commons at the bar of that House, to hear the commission read. Mr. Lee, the principal clerk, followed by a number of the members, left the house in obedience to that message. Upon their return, the clerk stated that they had been in the House of Peers, where they had heard His Majesty's commission read, directing them to proceed immediately to the election of a Speaker.

Sir WILLIAM SCOTT arose, and addressed the principal clerk. He said, That it was with all possible deference to the House, and with the most entire consciousness of the proper modesty of any pretension of his, that he seized the opportunity of addressing the chair for a few minutes, on the subject recommended to their attention from the throne. That the election of a Speaker was the first function of the House in order of time, and amongst the first of its functions in point of importance; for that it was no less than to delegate the person who was to guide the deliberations, maintain the privileges, and enforce the duties of this general representative body of this great United Country.—That it was difficult to describe in adequate terms what the talents are which constituted the qualifications; they were such as might hardly be expected to exist in combination, if experience had not shewn them to have existed in the numerous instances, (some of very recent date,) of men who had successfully performed the task—the arduous task,—of communicating honour to a station itself most honourable.—That in adverting to the nature and species of the qualifications which the object of such a choice ought to possess, he need not premise, as the basis of honourable, a true spirit of old English loyalty; in other words, an affectionate attachment to the person and family of our Sovereign, and to the ancient and reverend constitution of our country.—That with an unconquerable hostility to the wild and desolating principles which had waged a rancorous war against the best and dearest interests of mankind, he must unite a love of rational improvement and temperate correction. To an enlargement of mind capable of containing the most extensive subjects, must be added the faculty of descending with precision to the most minute; to a tenacious regard for forms, a liberal regard for principles; to a jealous affection for the privileges of the House, an awful sense of its duties; to habits of laborious research, powers of prompt and instant decision; to a firmness that could resist solicitation, a suavity of nature that could receive it without impatience; and to a dignity of public demeanour, suited to the quality of great affairs, and commanding the respect that was requisite for conducting them, an urbanity of private manners that could soften the asperities of business, and adorn an office of severe labour, with the conciliatory elegance of a situation of ease. That in looking round the assembly, (enriched, as it had been by the accession of talents from a sister country) it was impossible not to feel a satisfaction in observing that there was no inconsiderable number of persons in it, whom the general voice of the House could pronounce equal to the demands of the station described, various and important as they might be, and that in this dignified number were to be found (and in fair proportion) as well many gentlemen not bred to the study and practice of the law, as those who had.—That with all the partiality he might be supposed to entertain, he felt his full portion of national pride in acknowledging that splendid as the talents were which that profession has exhibited to this House, they had been fully equalled by those which other educations and other habits of life, in this favoured country, have been in the course of producing to its notice and admiration.—That amidst such copious materials for a happy selection, it might be difficult for the House, if it acted upon its mere sense of supposed merit, (however reasonably founded,) to name any individual, without feeling that it might possibly have occasion to suspect, (and suspecting, to lament,) that it had lost the benefit of other abilities, perhaps superior to those which had attracted its choice. But that it was the good fortune of the House at this time not to be left to act upon its mere sense of supposed merit; for it had the experience of tried worth to guide its determination.—That many of them, (a large proportion,) who had seats in the last parliament, must recollect, (with every feeling of gratitude for past, and sanguine expectation of future services,) that there is a person to whose nomination that experience had set its authentic and deciding seal;—he meant the Right Hon. person who filled that office in the two last sessions of that parliament; and filled it in a manner which is justly described in the highest terms of possible praise, when he said that he consoled that House for the loss of the eminent talents which in the same office had challenged so large a portion of its veneration and respect.—That to him who stands distinguished by the supe-frage of general applause, it was presumptuous to apply the suffrage of particular commendation; otherwise that he should be tempted to use his own language in expressing the sense which every individual of that House entertained, and in claiming on their behalf from new members some confidence for the propriety of that sense, respecting the manner in which, by a happy mixture of industry the most persevering, of attention the most minute, of knowledge the most exact, of private civility the most attractive, and of the observance of public decorum the most correct, that Right Hon. person had performed the duty and sustained the dignity of that honourable office.—That it might be proper to content himself with observing, that, in the judgment of all, he fully realised all the hopes, (for they then existed principally as hopes,) which were held out to that house in the eloquent panegyric which introduced him to its choice; and that he is now proposed in those additional advantages, that he possessed a confirmed experience in the duties of the office, and parliament possessed a no less confirmed experience of his entire ability to discharge them.

Mr. LASCELLES said, that the wisdom of the House had already been shewn in the choice they had made of a person possessing such adequate talent and ability towards the conclusion of the last Parlt., when the difficulties became more numerous and complicated—its affairs more intricate and extensive, and which required his most minute attention, as well as his most unremitting diligence and exertion. The success that attended his endeavours, and the unanimous approbation, were the best testimonies of those talents and abilities of the Rt. Hon. Gent. to fill so important an office—an office which it was at this time the more essential should be filled with adequate ability, as the fate not only of this country, but perhaps of all Europe, may depend upon the deliberations of the present session. On this subject he could with pleasure descend, and he had wished to enlarge where he had such an ample field; but the able anticipation of the learned Gent. left him only to second the motion with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. ABBOTT said, he felt impressed with a considerable degree of difficulty in expressing the feelings that must arise from so distinguished an honour being conferred on him, when he considered the difficulties of the situation, its important and numerous duties and relations, he felt the more such distinguished approbation. The short experience he had during his situation in that chair, had only further convinced him of the difficulty and consequence of so high an office; that the duties of a Speaker of that House must require the most ardent zeal, as well as the most incessant attention, the minute and careful study of the rules and orders of the House, to defend the rights of Parlt. and maintain its importance and dignity, carefully to watch over those points which most materially concern it, and which in so eminent a degree, in its rigid observance, relate, through the representative, to the rights and liberties of the subject. All these considerations powerfully weighed in his mind, and involved his most anxious concern; but he must at the same time remark, that however enviable the honour, however high the situation, and dignified so important an office, his elevation to that dignity would become more painful than glorious, and would confound rather than flatter, unless he acquired the confidence of the House; unless he possessed that, the acceptance of it would be entitled to censure. To endeavour to obtain it, to discharge all the duties belonging to that chair, must be the unceasing object of his study, and evince the sincerity of his wishes to return the obligation he felt himself under, at their approbation.

Ld. CASTLEREAGH said, that he could not refrain from expressing the gratification he felt in again congratulating the Speaker upon his reelection to that seat, which his talents had so long conspicuously marked him out for. The choice was as expressive of the judgment of the House, as it was honourable to him. At the period when the chair became vacant, after the transcendent talents and ability by which it had been sustained for such a length of time, it became a matter of considerable importance and difficulty to fix an adequate successor; and, numerous as are the duties and relations which tend to so important an office, and which had been so ably and eloquently pointed out by his Rt. Hon. and learned Friend; the unanimous approbation which had distinguished the present choice of the House, completely evinced that every distinguishing trait necessary for such a situation was manifestly acknowledged to be the feature of the character of the present possessor; such being evidently the general opinion; such being the cause of general satisfaction, he should not conclude without assuring him of his own private satisfaction at seeing him once more in a seat so well calculated for him, to which his abilities and talents, great as might be the necessity for their exertion, would add strength and dignity, and from which the House would derive so much assistance and support. His Ldp. expressed his conviction that the choice, when stamped with His Majesty's sanction, would give universal satisfaction; and concluded with moving the question of adjournment, which was carried.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Nov. 17.—At two o'clock their Lordships sent the Usher of the Black Rod to desire the immediate attendance of the Commons, to present their Speaker for His Majesty's approbation. The Commons immediately presented themselves at the bar, with Mr. Abbott at their head, attended by Sir W. Scott on one side, and Mr. Lascelles on the other, all three in full dress, Sir William in his robes.—Mr. Abbott addressed the Lords appointed to give His Majesty's approbation in a neat speech, as follows:—"I am to acquaint your Ldps, that His Majesty's faithful and loyal Commons, having, in obedience to His Majesty's command, and in virtue of their ancient right, proceeded to the election of a Speaker, their choice has fallen on me. In compliance with their wish, and from a deep sense of the honour they have done me, I present myself at your Ldps' bar; but, sensible at the same time of my own inadequacy to the duties of this high and important office, I humbly pray that His Majesty may allow them to re-consider their choice, and to present a worthier person.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—"Mr. Abbott, the Lords appointed by His Majesty's commission have it in command from His Majesty, to signify that His Majesty, fully persuaded of the wisdom and loyalty of his faithful Commons, is perfectly satisfied with the choice they have made, which the experience he has already had of you renders still more agreeable. We therefore, by authority of His Majesty's commission, do allow and confirm you their Speaker."

MR. ABBOTT.—"My Lords, I am deeply penetrated with gratitude for this new mark of His Majesty's favour and beneficence, which I receive with all due humility. Appointed by the choice of His Majesty's Commons to be their Speaker, and confirmed in the office by His Majesty's approbation, it now becomes my duty to solicit from his Majesty, for his loyal and faithful Commons, the usual freedoms and immunities, which, by the usage and constitution of parliament, they are entitled to claim; freedom of speech in their debates, freedom of their persons and servants from arrest, and freedom of their estates from process, and free access to His Majesty to communicate their counsels. I have further to intreat, that every thing addressed to His Majesty by his faithful Commons, may receive the most favourable construction; and that if I myself should inadvertently fall into any error in communicating their sentiments, His Majesty may impute the blame entirely to me, and not extend any part of it to his faithful Commons."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—"Mr. Abbott, we have it in command from His Majesty to say, that His Majesty allows to his Commons assembled in this parliament, all those freedoms, privileges, and immunities, which the Commons of former parliaments have heretofore enjoyed from His Majesty and his predecessors. With respect to the apprehensions which you entertain, we are commanded to inform you, that His Majesty sees no ground to fear that you will say any thing that can incur his displeasure; but we have at the same time to assure you, that every thing coming from you, and from His Majesty's Commons, shall receive from His Majesty the most favourable interpretation."

HOUSE OF LORDS, Nov. 23.—At a quarter before three, His Majesty came to the House of Peers, with the ceremonies usual upon such occasions. The Usher of the Black Rod summoned the attendance of the Gentlemen of the House of Commons, who immediately came below the bar, with the Speaker at their head. To the Lords and Commons assembled, His Majesty then addressed a most gracious speech from the throne. (See p. 690.)

His Majesty then left the House, and the Commons retired. The Lord Chancellor next read a copy of the King's Speech to the House. It was read a second time by Mr. Rose, the reading clerk.

LORD ARDEN then rising, addressed their Lordships.—"My Lords, the pleasure with which I have heard His Majesty's most gracious Speech, excites me to rise for the purpose of moving your Lordships to answer it in a suitable address. We know, my Lords, by personal feeling and observation, not less than from the universal voice of the country, that the prosperity of our manufactures, the extension of our commerce, the general abundance of the necessaries and comforts of life, the heart-felt felicity of the whole people, the ardour of their loyalty to His Majesty's person, and their attachment to the Brit. constitution under the present administration of its active powers, are fully equal to that high and encouraging representation of them which has been given in the speech from the throne. We cannot but be pleased that such testimonies should exist of the merits of his Majesty's govt. and that it is for the future welfare of a country, thus far forth great and prosperous, that our deliberations are to provide. Of the present condition of Europe, it is difficult to think without deep anxiety. There is not a power on the continent between whose interests and ours certain relations do not subsist. The order of dominion cannot be there indefinitely changed, without endangering the security of all for which Britain is dear to us. However much then may have been conceded to imperious necessity of circumstances; whatever of the mere pride of arrogant pretension we may have been induced to waive, for the sake of peace; though we may have reluctantly abandoned allies, who had no longer the power, nor the will, to make a stand for their own political existence; yet there are limits, beyond which it is forbidden by just policy to extend this plan of conduct. We cannot, therefore, but approve His Majesty's resolution to keep the vigilance of his government awake to the changes in the arrangement of continental power. Such vigour of preparations as may be requisite to give due authority to that vigilance, will be neither disagreeable to the nation at large, nor inconsistent with the warmest wishes of the members of this House. We can cordially sympathize in the sense of the happy effects which have already ensued from an union that has concentrated the energies, and usefully simplified the administration of these kingdoms. The supplies which, in such a state of affairs, to a govt. so beneficent, from a country so flourishing, may be wanted, a people so loyal would not be easily persuaded to deny."—His Lordship here moved an address, of which the thanks, the congratulations, and the promises, nearly echoed the terms of the speech.

LORD NELSON.—"I will not deny myself the pleasure of seconding an address, with the purport of which my wishes zealously coincide. Nor, am I willing to omit this opportunity of expressing my satisfaction in the prosperity of these kingdoms, and my approbation of a plan of govt. which proposes to maintain the antient dignity of this country in the system of Europe, though without any hot-headed sacrifice of the benefits of peace. War did not exhaust our resources. Amid the uncertainties of negotiation, in the difficulties of a peace, which has not, perhaps, brought all the wonted content and safety of that condition, our national industry has not been slackened; nor has it been frustrated of its rewards. The condition of prosperity which the country enjoys, is such as would render us inexcusable if we should sacrifice its honour. Unsuccessful, so far as we were directly engaged; in the war of valour, of martial force, of military talents, France may, perhaps, hope to gain more by that of artifice, of circumvention, of equivocal faith. But Brit. strength of understanding, and rectitude of intention, ever have been, and I hope in God will ever be, more than an equal match for every less candid and ingenuous art. I, my Lords, have, in different countries, seen much of the miseries of war; I have seen horrors of human distress, which have made an indelible impression on my heart. I am, therefore, most sincerely, in my inmost soul, a man of peace. Yet would I not, for the sake of any peace, however otherwise fortunate, consent to sacrifice one jot of England's honour. Our honour is inseparably combined with our genuine interests. Hitherto there has been nothing greater known on the continent than the faith, the untarnished honour, the generous public sympathies, the high diplomatic influence, the commerce, the grandeur, the resistless power, the unconquerable valour of the Brit. nation. Wherever I have served in foreign countries, I have witnessed these to be the sentiments with which Britons were regarded. The advantages of such a reputation, my Lords, are not to be hastily relinquished, are not to be lightly brought into hazard: I, for one, must rejoice, that His Majesty has been pleased to signify his intention to pay due regard to the connexion between the interest of this country and the preservation of the liberties of Europe. It is satisfactory to know, that the preparations to maintain our dignity in peace are not to be neglected. Those supplies which His Majesty shall for such purposes demand, his people will most earnestly grant. The nation is satisfied that the government seeks in peace or war no interest separate from that of the people at large: and as the nation was pleased with that sincere spirit of peace with which the late treaty was negotiated, so, now that a restless and unjust ambition in those with whom we desired sincere amity has given a new alarm, the country will rather prompt the government to assert its honour, than need to be roused with difficulty to such measures of vigorous defence, as the exigency of the times may require.

The MARQ. of ABERCORN believed that every Noble Lord who heard him would agree, that the present was one of the most critical and momentous periods that ever occurred in the History of Britain. They had many bitter recollections as to the past, and many new and urgent considerations with respect to the future; the present novel and unlinged state of Europe was among the latter; and with respect to the country itself, the situation in which it once stood, now stands, and is likely to stand in future, were serious and questionable considerations for the first new Parliament of the United Kingdom. His Lordship censured, in strong terms, the line of policy adopted by the present administration; and seemed so compare the conduct of France and this country, in their political intercourses, as a system of insolence on the one hand, and of degrading humiliation on the other. Great changes were effected on the continent; this country should be prepared for the worst—it was still adequate to its own defence, and it was happy that it was so; the very fate of the country was at stake. The power we had to cope with was always our rival, and never our friend; but a rival that was always more successful in peace than in war; the present posture of this rival was formidable and menacing indeed—his neck upon every neighbouring and prostrate nation, and his hand for ever on his sword.—Such a situation as ministers had brought this country to was lamentable, after all the blood and treasure which had been sacrificed for her honour and security. The Noble Marquis delivered his sentiments upon the various points connected with this general subject, and commented at length upon the subject of the late pacification, and the conduct of ministers with respect to the preliminary, and the definitive treaty; of these he spoke in general terms of disapprobation; he considered the present as an experimental peace; but it was with satisfaction he felt himself disposed to argue with a Noble Viscount, who thought the people were now unanimous in a determination to support the honour of their country, and to resist the overweening ambition of our ancient rivals; and he stated some instances in which he considered the late enemies of the country as having acted in a fraudulent and perfidious manner. He thought a vigorous and spirited line of conduct could alone extricate this country from its perilous situation: they should boldly look the danger in the face. The consideration, even were it true, of our having no continental allies, should not dismay us; we should have the less to clog our operations, or to divert our resources.—France, he conceived, to be surrounded by inveterate enemies, who only waited for the moment in which they could effectually declare themselves: in that view, all the chances of war would be in our favour. Spirit, unanimity, and a due confidence in our internal resources, would effectually enable us to resist the unwarrantable ambition of France.

The EARL of CARLISLE.—“My Lords, what was foretold has come to pass. No deep politician would ever have imagined, that peace negotiated in the circumstances, and on the conditions of that which His Majesty's ministers were pleased to give us as a peace, could bring with it any thing better than the miseries, the losses, the suspicions of war, without the name. It was not merely its being negotiated under menaces of invasion, that moved my opposition to it. From the first, I could see in it nothing but a concession of every subject of reasonable contention, which the fortune of war had not before taken from us. If the country be at present prosperous, it is a proof that the unlucky talents of the present ministers have not yet absolutely achieved upon it the worst they are capable of. But let them entertain no uneasiness on that score: in their hands it will soon come to have little or no remains of prosperity to boast. A remedy for our present ills, my Lords, is not to be expected from any preparations, or any change of views; it is in the government, in the very existence, in the primary concoction of the present administration, that all the mischief had its origin. I had the misfortune to be solitary in declaring my sentiments in this House against them, when they came first into power. I could take no merit to myself for the foresight of the ills which they were to create to their country. I may say, in the words of a great man, Dr. Samuel Johnson, "that many men, many women, many children, were easily capable of discerning as much in regard to a ministry so made up." They came into office without any just claim to their country's confidence; and in their impatience to purchase some title to the nation's favour, they scrupled not to barter away the nation's honour for a peace, of which even themselves at last confess the shame and the insecurity. I oppose no supplies; I disapprove no preparations; but well am I assured, my Lords, that without an entire change of administration, every other measure we may recommend, must be to no purpose."

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK.—Some noble Lords, who have spoken before me, have drawn an inference from certain phrases in His Majesty's speech, which those phrases were, surely, not meant to insinuate. There is no reason to suppose, that we are to rush to war, because we see it prudent to strengthen our peace establishment. From that care let us rather hope more certain permanency to the peace.

LORD GRENVILLE could not feel that he had done his duty if he should go home without having expressed the anxieties which filled his mind; and he must declare, that it was with the utmost astonishment that he saw the House called upon to agree to the address which was moved, without any other information than that which was contained in his Majesty's most gracious speech from the throne. It was a hacknied, and often a misapplied phrase in parliament, to speak of the time present as of the most critical period that ever was—but he might be permitted to say, that if ever that phrase was applicable, it was at this moment. The new parliament was assembled in a moment, certainly the most critical that this country ever saw. It was critical and tremendous; and it was rendered more so by the silence of ministers. He never was more anxious than to know from them what was the real state of the world at this moment: and what were the precise circumstances which had induced ministers to assume a firm and vigorous tone now, instead of the tame, conceding, languid temper which they had manifested up to this moment. It was certainly impossible for him, or for any man to unravel their conduct by any thing that was visible. They had brought us down to the miserable alternative, either of a degrading retraction of the high language they had at length assumed, or of entering into war at a moment when we had deprived ourselves of the best means of making it effectual to its object. Why they had been so tame before, and why so vehement now, was what puzzled and confounded his mind. True, he saw a most powerful argument for their high tone and menacing attitude; but he had seen the same reasons all along; and he was astonished that ministers had not thought it due to that House and the Country to explain why they had before acquiesced, and why they now resolved to acquiesce no more.—His Majesty's speech contained three distinct propositions, in every one of which he most cordially acquiesced. In the first of these propositions he more peculiarly concurred, because it included in itself a direct and merited censure of the present administration. Nothing could be more true than that it was the incumbent duty of ministers to have a watchful solicitude over the interests of this country as connected with those of Europe. But it was equally certain that His Majesty's ministers had shewn no such watchfulness. He called upon their Lordships, whether they could truly say that the King's ministers had shewn any just vigilance over these important interests of the state; and particularly in regard to that which constituted the second proposition in the speech.—That His Majesty could not view with indifference any material change in the relative condition and strength of the different powers on the continent. Nothing was more just—nothing more certain than this proposition; but the observation that must arise in every mind on the subject was—did no material change take place in the relative condition and power of the nations on the continent; or had there, in a single instance, appeared the smallest trace of any attention whatever on the part of government to these objects, which they now truly affirm to be so highly important? The answer must be obvious. Between the signature of the preliminaries of peace and the definitive treaty, Louisiana and Italy were added to the power of France. Surely ministers saw this with indifference. It was not their language that he looked to, but their acts. They saw this important change, and yet, with arms in their hands, they concluded the definitive treaty; and concluded it on terms still more disadvantageous than those even of the preliminaries. Here, however, perhaps, they had taken their stand.—The peace, once made, it might be supposed they had determined to resist all fresh encroachments. Precisely the reverse. The ink was still wet—the wax was not yet cold with which this treaty was concluded, when Piedmont, the bulwark of Italy, was annexed to the French empire. With a certain knowledge that Russia was averse to this encroachment, the French artfully concealed their intentions for fear of a joint remonstrance from Great Britain and Russia. Nothing could be more obviously for our interest than to have entered into such a concert. From the mere apprehension of it France withheld her hand, until you had concluded and ratified that disgraceful treaty. Then, seeing the indifference of the government of G. Britain to every continental object, they struck the blow, by which the ancient ally of the Brit. crown—

the faithful friend, was driven from his seat. It was important to the true understanding of this atrocious proceeding that they should trace back the disastrous history for a few memorable years; and it was the more necessary, because ministers, not content with abandoning that ally to total destruction, not content with omitting all mention of his name, both in the preliminaries and the definitive treaty, had actually asserted in parliament, (a thing without example) that, "strictly speaking, we should have been justified in making war upon him." He needed not to recall to their Lordship's memory that the father of the deposed sovereign, seeing the danger to which he was threatened by the French Revolution, and actually attacked by France, entered into an alliance with us to prosecute the war. In that alliance he acted faithfully to the best of his very limited means. He acted well, though unfortunately. He was first stripped of Savoy, then of Piedmont, and lastly was taken prisoner in his own capital. In this situation, whatever act he had done, could not, according to the law of nations, (to which, though he had once heard it styled a heap of useless lumber, he would still venture to appeal,) be construed even as releasing us from the obligations of our alliance, much less as a just ground for hostility against him. But the fact was, that even in the compulsory treaty which the King of Sardinia then made with France, when a prisoner in his capital, he actually insisted on inserting an article that he should not, in any case, be compelled to act in any manner inconsistent with his friendship with G. Britain; and this is the ally whom the present ministers have abandoned, of whom they omitted all mention in their treaty, and whom they mentioned in parliament only to vilify, to traduce, and to insult him! This is a strong case; but it is not the whole case; the King, whose conduct has been stated, died not long after this transaction. His son succeeded him, and, by the most flagrant violation of the treaty which has just been mentioned, the French drove him away from his capital of Piedmont; but he still remained King of Sardinia. At a time when we were excluded from every port in the Mediterranean, except where our arms had taken post, the French required from this sovereign, as the price of their friendship, that he should exclude not only all our mercantile and armed ships from his ports, but also expel or arrest all our agents. This he most positively refused to do, and refused it even while the present government was at that very moment negotiating, without concert or communication with him: this he did, preferring, as he said, British gratitude to French friendship. And yet this friendly, honourable power was not only excluded from the peace, but has since the peace been annihilated on the continent, and his Majesty's ministers have seen no material change effected thereby! It does not appear that even a remonstrance was made on the measure of his ruin. Was not this enough to rouse them? Surely it would be thought that, penetrated with the principles which they had put into his Majesty's mouth, they would have made a stand here. Let us look then to the progress of the next events. The treaty was made in the month of March; it was ratified in May; in June Piedmont was, by a formal decree, annexed to France; in August the consular government made a grand sweep and disposal of the entire constitution of Germany, and of all the princes and powers in it! Surely, either Germany was not in Europe, or we had no concern in the affairs of Europe; or Germany, perhaps, was a place unknown to us, or so insignificant and so distant as to be unworthy of notice—or ministers, who put into the King's mouth that they could not see any material change with indifference, would have taken the alarm at this step. Surely it demands an explanation, that the only power over which the French had not domineered—the only power upon which they had not trampled—the only power upon which we could rely as the means of counteracting the inordinate ambition and strides of the consular govt. was thus insulted and broken down, so as to deliver over the whole of Germany to France, and yet the King's ministers did not view this step with jealousy; nay, though this was done without even the accustomed civility of a communication to the Brit. court, and though they received no other notice of it than by the newspapers, through the message of Talleyrand to the Senate, yet no notice was taken of the outrage—no step taken, though it was, in one article, a flagrant breach of the treaty of Amiens, and in another involved a gross and personal insult and injury to our own Sovereign. Their Lordships would remember that the interests of the House of Orange, omitted in the preliminaries, was by a new article to be taken care of in the definitive treaty. In that instance a most perfidious subtlety was practised on the weakness and credulity of the King's ministers, of which they were justly ashamed; and the noble person who signed the treaty, pledged himself in that House, that the indemnity of the House of Orange should be ample and adequate to his loss. What turns out to be the case? The indemnities of the House of Orange are regulated by France, without even the formality of any concert with G. Britain; and they do not amount to one-tenth part of his loss. And yet no interference in his favour was perceived. The same stupor which had prevailed all along still held the King's ministers, and their conduct was still marked by humiliation and concession. Nay, that was not all. Even the miserable pittance that was allotted to the House of Orange was in part extorted from the just claims and rights of the Elector of Hanover; so that our own Sovereign was plundered to pay the debt of justice which G. Britain owed to the House of Orange, while he was at the same time exposed to the indignity of seeing, by the allotment of Hildesheim to Prussia, a Prussian garrison placed in the very heart of his dominions. It had often falsely, and most foolishly been said, that G. Britain had suffered on account of its connexion with Hanover. Now more truly might it be said, that Hanover had suffered on account of its connexion with G. Britain, or rather on account of its connexion with the present ministers of G. Britain. He would, however, forbear to enlarge on the painful and delicate topic, particularly as he saw and felt the impression which it made on their Ldps. What then must they think of the King's ministers, who had seen even this measure with torpid indifference? How can they justify themselves for having, at the very moment when all this was perpetrating, gone on disbanding the army, dismantling the navy, surrendering post after post, and completely putting it out of their power to take advantage of the just indignation which these proceedings excited in every part of this country? They were cool, tranquil, indifferent spectators of all this: they dismantled ship after ship, reduced regiment after regiment, sent out orders to surrender Martinique and the Cape, and in this apathy we came down to the end of Sept. It is not till Oct. then that ministers took alarm. It is not possible for them to pretend that any thing aroused them till then; since no step was taken for internal or foreign defence. Something new must have occurred, to have driven ministers at length to take this new position, which made the 3d proposition in his Majesty's Speech. That proposition had also his most hearty concurrence. Though expressed in a form to comply with the rules, and suited to the language of parliament, yet ministers would agree with him that it was neither more nor less than that His Majesty announced to his parliament an imperious necessity for an augmentation of the national force, and that they should enable him to do so. This was the true intent and meaning of the phrase; and he certainly, for one, most cordially acquiesced in the wisdom, and even necessity of the measure. He thought it indispensable to our safety, and was only in dread, that by our rashness in disarming, it had been delayed too long. The Noble Lord recalled to the recollection of the House the only defence which had been made for the dishonourable peace that was concluded the 1st Oct. 1801.—That it was a peace made in the spirit of peace; and likely to be permanent, on account of the disposition which animated the Chief Consul. What had we seen in all this but the total want of foresight and capacity, with which men who aspire to the high station of government ought to be endowed? Those whose duty it was to inform themselves of the dispositions of our enemy, told us that the tone and temper of the negotiation were more satisfactory than the terms; and asserted that there was no reason to apprehend that this peace would be less permanent than any other that the country ever had concluded. The country was deluded for a time, but it did not last long. Nor a day had elapsed, —he might challenge observation on the word— not a single day had elapsed, without some act of insult, indignity, or attack upon G. Britain, or her ancient allies, since that time. But what now had occurred? Was it some change in the conduct of France—some new encroachment—

more violent and more fatal to Europe than all that was past? Was it the attack upon Switzerland? If this be the cause, he might ask, was the occupation of Switzerland, atrocious as it was, an act more violent in itself, or more injurious to our interests, than the annexation of Italy? Or was the seizing on Parma by one pretended treaty with Spain, a more outrageous insult against the public faith of nations, than the seizing on Louisiana by another? Their whole conduct had been a series of gross and inexcusable error; and he must take upon himself to say, that in such hands he could not trust the safety and independence of the empire—nay, he might say the existence; for he had no scruple in saying that the very existence of the Brit. empire depended on the system which should be pursued for the next three months. Nothing of personal animosity influenced his mind in making this observation. He could truly say with the Noble Earl near him, that he had no personal ill will to any one member of his Majesty's present councils; but he must solemnly declare that, if we meant by any one strong united effort to save the vessel of the state, we must change the persons in whose hands the direction was placed. We must completely get rid of that wavering, indecisive, and contradictory conduct which had subjected us to the derision of Europe for the last twelve-month. The acquiescence of ministers up to the interference in the affairs of Switzerland, and still more the time and mode of that interference had shewn that our councils were in the hands of men totally unfit and inadequate to the crisis. For now that they had awakened from this stupor, and shewn some signs of life, they had done it when they could have no communication nor any concert with those powers of the continent who could have made an interference effectual. What shall we say of the impotence of those ministers when they make this explosion of rage at the outrage on Switzerland at the very moment when Austria was making a declaration in the opposite tendency? Why not have taken the moment when they might have had co-operation? Why wait till the season for action was past, why delay their remonstrance till the French troops were actually in march? Why first resolve to give up Martinique and the Cape, and then take offence?—Surely the whole conduct was calculated only to expose us to the contempt of the enemy. Martinique, the Cape, and Malta, three great commanding ports, were in our hands.—Martinique was surrendered, and the very same week in which we heard a speech from the throne calling upon us to arm against France, brought us the account that ministers had given into the hands of France the key of the West Indies. Was there then so little foresight in government that they did not know even their own intentions six weeks before they acted? Could it possibly be right to have sent the order for the evacuation then, and to have armed in Europe at the very same moment? Or to execute the treaty in the West Indies in the same breath in which you complain that France has violated every article of it in Europe? Martini-que, however, was gone, this bulwark was lost to us, perhaps, for ever. Orders were also sent out to surrender the Cape: and it was only a matter of accident if it was not so. He should be curious to learn the date of the subsequent orders sent out for its detention; because it would shew that if it escaped the folly of their conduct, it was by accident only that it was preserved. Malta, however, was still in our hands, and he rejoiced in the fact. We were indebted for its safety to one of the blunders which had marked their administration. Oh! that all their blunders had been equally fortunate! They had made an arrangement for Malta which never could be executed, and it was only because their own contrivances was incapable of being executed that we were now in possession of that invaluable post. The noble lord concluded his most spirited and vehement animadversion on ministry by saying, that a sense of duty to his King and Country had compelled him to express his sentiments of their conduct. He had never been one of these whom they had duped into the conviction that we might enjoy even a little delusive tranquillity. He knew that a nation like Great Britain ought never to buy protection by sacrifices and concessions. All history, and even the history of our nation, was against such a step. When our ancestors poorly bribed the Danes with money to return to their homes, they laid out the sums in the purchase of ships to return to the attack. We were now trying the same experiment on a larger scale, and he was confident it would be with the same result. Every fresh concession we made to France operated in a double sense to weaken us, and to strengthen her. All these successive sacrifices tended not at all to soften her animosity, but operated largely indeed in increasing her means of hostility. Let us not delude ourselves with the idea that the alternative of peace or war is in our own choice. We might, if we chose it, still consider ourselves at peace with France, and it belonged not to him to decide this question in the present moment under all the disadvantages and weakness which the conduct of government had brought upon us. But whether we did so or not, France was not an iota the less at war with us. She was so now, and she had constantly been so from the signature of the preliminaries to the present hour. She looked invariably to the subversion of our government, and the destruction of our country, nor could we even console ourselves with the shameful hope, which had, he feared, operated in some parts of Europe, that if the independence of the state were subdued, yet our private properties might be saved, and our personal ease secured. If the examples of so many other countries were good for nothing else, they might at least teach us to renounce this hope. And we must eternally keep in mind this truth—that though we might be at peace with France, France was actually at war with England; as much so as if the declaration of war had been made; perhaps she might choose, indeed, to call the speech of this day a declaration of war. If she did so, it could not make us worse. We must exert ourselves; we must strain every nerve; we must struggle for an existence; by wisdom and vigilance, by measures of extensive and active preparation, and by a tone of firmness and decision supported by a conduct corresponding with it, even peace might, in his opinion, be still obtained and enjoyed from this very hour. Not a nominal, dishonourable, and ruinous truce, but real peace founded in a sense of our dignity, supported by a knowledge of our own strength, and maintained by the respect which our conduct would then create abroad, and by the confidence it would inspire at home. But he had no hesitation in saying, that if we meant to make that struggle effectual, it must not be under the auspices of the present persons in office. No; not under such men. There was but one man in the kingdom, to whom every eye was directed—to whom every heart was attracted, as alone equal to rally the national force—as alone equal to weather the storm.

LORD PELHAM said, that was not the proper time to go into a detail of the nature and extent of the intended augmentation of the force of the kingdom; he hoped, therefore, that his silence upon the subject would not be construed into an assent to the construction that had been put by the Noble Lords over the way (Lords Grenville and Carlisle) upon that part of his Majesty's speech; but thus much he would say, that no sudden or great augmentation of the troops was intended, nor did there appear any thing in the state of Europe that made such an augmentation necessary. With regard to that part of the Noble Lord's reasoning which applied to the indemnities assigned to the different states of Germany, his Ldp. said, he could not think this country had any justifiable cause to interfere, so long as the several states in question were satisfied themselves with the indemnities allotted to them.

LORD CARYSFORT said, he was sorry to learn from the noble Secretary of State, that they were not likely to be gratified with that essential augmentation, which the critical situation of the empire indispensably required. It was undoubtedly a solemn and a serious thing to engage in war, and the noble Secretary of State would not be justified in unnecessarily plunging the country into a renewal of hostilities, but there might occur circumstances which might make such a measure unavoidable. His Ldp. drew the distinction between peace and war being considered as experiments. War, he admitted, to be an experiment, because the events of a war were uncertain; but peace, he contended, was not an experiment, but a matter of certainty. He declared he was astonished to hear the noble Secretary of State talk so lightly of the distribution of territory in Germany. Was it a matter of no importance to this country to have the means of carrying on her commerce with security? Did they not know, that from the mouth of the Ens, to the Bay of Trieste, we had not a single fort in our possession? The North of Germany appeared to him to be of the highest importance to the commercial interests of this country.

LORD HOBART rose to complain of the injustice of Ld. Grenville, in censuring the King's servants, on account of the dismemberment of Germany, when he could not but know that the treaty of Luneville was made during that Noble Lord's administration; and that Germany was brought into its present condition by circumstances which were not subject to the controul of any ministers. It was enough for him to say, that the indemnities in Germany were not considered as of sufficient importance to prevent its making peace. The Noble Lord stood up to charge his Majesty's servants with incapacity; it did not become him, (Lord H.) to say one word in answer to such a charge; he only desired that the present administration might be judged by its conduct; but he would tell that Noble Lord, that he could not charge the present ministers with incapacity, without at the same time criminating himself for having relinquished his post.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Tuesday, Nov. 23.—The Speaker having read his Majesty's Speech, (for which see p. 690.)

Mr. TRENCH rose to move an address of thanks to his Majesty. In viewing our internal situation, he should advert first to those sources of prosperity which were more immediately within our own reach; and in this view of our situation, there appeared to be the greatest cause for exultation. Whether they turned their eyes to the attachment displayed by all ranks of the people to the constitution of this country, in the most trying situations. Whether they looked to the increasing revenue of the empire, or to the improved state of its agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, in every point of view there was the greatest reason for congratulation and triumph. In looking at the state of our commerce, we should nowhere find the verification of those melancholy; those sinister predictions which were made by some gentlemen, that our commerce, though great during the war, would decline at the peace. Instead of being injured, our resources remained, not only unimpaired, but improved, after exertions almost greater than imagination could conceive. Under these circumstances, every one must undoubtedly wish for the continuance of peace; but yet we had no reason to apprehend the event of a war, if war was necessary for the security of the country. It would be unnecessary for him to enter into any argument to shew the necessity of our keeping an eye upon the measures adopted on the continent, because it was a proposition recognised by the last parliament, in its address to the throne on the conclusion of the peace. That events which had occurred on the continent had demonstrated a great disposition to encroachment on the part of France, and naturally excited some degree of jealousy, could not be denied. But in what manner and at what point we ought to interfere; or whether we ought to interfere without concert with other powers, were questions upon which it was impossible for them to decide without a greater knowledge than they possessed. He sincerely hoped that peace might be maintained; but if the honour, the independence, and the security of this country required measures of an opposite nature, he was sure ministers would not want the hearty co-operation of the whole empire.

Mr. CURZON rose to second the Address. He congratulated the House upon the flourishing state of the trade, the manufactures, and the commerce of this country. He perfectly concurred with the honourable mover of the address, upon the importance of preserving peace, if peace could be preserved consistently with our honour and dignity.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said, the best way to preserve the blessings of peace, was to shew, that, if necessary, we were prepared for a state of war. When he considered the conduct of the person at the head of the govt. of France since the conclusion of the treaty of peace; how little pacific he had shewn himself since that period, and how much pains he had taken to irritate the feelings of this country, it certainly could not be denied that we ought to put ourselves in a state of readiness. He said, that ministers had been much to blame in disarming so quickly as they had done; in doing so they had deviated from the conduct of all former ministers upon former occasions. They had always taken care at least to provide a force equal to that of France; instead of which, if we were now to go to war, he doubted if we had a fleet equal to that of the enemy; because, since the peace they had constantly been increasing their force, and we had been decreasing ours. But the stronger his feelings were with regard to the conduct of France, the more he lamented the loss of those great talents which had so long watched over the interests of this country, and had so successfully counteracted the efforts of France against her; he could not help lamenting the loss of the abilities of the right hon. gent. he alluded to, because he was convinced that there never was a time at which this country stood more in need of those talents than it did at present.

Sir J. WROTTESLEY said, that he felt himself called upon to take a short review of the conduct of ministers, and in so doing, he should follow the example of the hon. gent. who moved the Address. The hon. mover of the Address had dwelt upon the improved state of our manufactures; he was sincerely glad to hear that statement from the hon. gent. because we should, perhaps, soon see the moment when it would be necessary to call all the resources of the country into action. He was sorry, however, to observe, that the state of the manufactures, in the part of the country to which he belonged, was not such as to justify the hon. gent.'s assertion. There were many important topics upon which the hon. mover of the Address had very wisely touched but lightly, and his doing so, must have been a matter of satisfaction to those who sat under him. Very soon after the signing of the treaty of peace, ministers found that the spirit of the gov't. of France was not such as they could approve. France had dictated to the empire on the subject of indemnities, she had lately annexed the Duchy of Parma to her overgrown dominion. We had seen the glorious achievements of the patriots of Switzerland to establish the liberty of their country, frustrated by France, and that, without any known remonstrance on the part of this country. He did not know what the conduct of ministers had been upon this subject, but he knew that Switzerland had been over-run by a large French army; he knew that the best people of that country were in the power of the Consul of France, sharing perhaps the same fate as the unfortunate Tous-saint, lying in a dungeon. In this gloomy prospect, he saw but one dawn of hope, and that was, the calling forth again the greatest abilities in this country: they had saved this country in times of the greatest difficulty and danger, and might still save it.

Mr. PYCHES said, he should consider the Speech which had been read, as the speech of the minister; and considering it in that point of view, he had no difficulty in pronouncing it a complete Salmagundi. He was convinced that the French gov't. had no intention of violating the peace with this country.

Mr. FOX—Some expressions, Sir, which fell from the hon. mover of this Address, as well as from two hon. gent. under the gallery, make it necessary for me to trouble the House with a few observations, explaining the grounds of the vote which I shall give, and which will be a vote of direct and cordial approbation to the Address. Before I proceed I will just say a few words respecting an expression in the Address, which may appear to stand in need of explanation, consistent with the principles on which I shall have the honour of voting on the present occasion. The expression to which I refer is that which pledges the House to make provision for the support of such an establishment as may fully provide for the national security, and while an ardent desire for peace is cultivated, assures his Majesty of cordial co-operation in vindicating the national interests and honour from the attacks of any foreign foe. As I understand the expression, it conveys to his Majesty no pledge which has not my fullest approbation, and it is only in consequence of an observation made use of by the hon. mover of the Address, that I consider it proper to advert to it. The hon. gent. let fall some hints about the necessity of keeping up a large establishment; but by the vote which I shall now give, I protest against any such inference; and certainly I do not, by agreeing to the Address, bind myself to the support of any establishment of this nature. Those who think that the peace of the country will be best maintained, and its security supported, by such an establishment, will understand the expressions in the Address in the sense which the hon. mover attaches to them; but I, who think that these objects would be best promoted by a small military establishment, whether with the view of preserving the peace, or of renewing the war, do not mean, by agreeing to the Address, at all to preclude myself from canvassing any estimates which will hereafter be laid on the table. Neither the Speech, nor the Address, indeed, speak of the extent of the establishment, but very properly speak of the subject generally, leaving the details to form the ground of future arrangement. I have thought it necessary to say these few words on this point, to prevent any misconception from applying to the opinion, which at a future time I may feel it my duty to submit to the House, when the extent of the establishment to be maintained comes regularly under consideration. Now, Sir, as to the observations of the two gent. to whom I have alluded, I think that they were introduced in rather a singular way. One hon. gent. (Sir J. Wrottesley) thinks that the language and spirit of the Speech are too pacific; but unfortunately the hon. gent. is not very consistent in his remarks, for he finds, in the conclusion of the Speech, a language employed which seemed designed to prepare the House and the public for an immediate renewal of hostilities. He is displeased at ministers for stating to the House a determination to watch with jealousy the changes in the relative situation of foreign powers, and asks what right this country has to interfere in the affairs of Switzerland, since they knew of similar acts on the part of France at the time the treaty of peace was concluded, and made no remonstrances on the subject? Such is the inconsistency of the hon. gent.'s observations, which appear to be introduced only for the purpose of blaming ministers, when no ground of blame existed. The other hon. gent. is offended with the representation given in the speech of the flourishing state of our commerce and manufactures: he says, that in the part of the country with which he is connected, the case is quite otherwise; and certainly, Sir, on such a subject the hon. gent.'s opinion deserves very great consideration. For myself I shall give no opinion on the subject. I hope the hon. gent. is mistaken; but whatever be the case, of this I am certain, that there is only one wish in the House and the Country, that our internal situation should be such as by the Speech it is described. Undoubtedly there are circumstances in the state of Europe which cannot fail to excite considerable alarm; but I hope there is no reason to be alarmed about the prosperity of our manufactures and commerce. Admitting, however, for the sake of argument, that they had suffered decay, I hope no one can for a moment conceive the absurd idea that we could better our commercial and manufacturing interests by plunging again into war.—With regard to the objections to the Address, they will be considered in a different way by different sides of the House. Those who defended the treaty of peace, when it was laid before the House, will defend it still on the same principles which originally induced them to give it their approbation, and they will naturally view the objections to the Address as frivolous and inconclusive. Those, on the other hand, who contended that they would not have made peace on the terms which the treaty contained, will be anxious to break a peace which they would not have made, and to renew a war which they wished to continue. But it may be said, that war would not now be renewed on the same principles on which it was formerly prosecuted, and that new causes of war had accrued since the treaty of peace was concluded. I cannot appeal to the House, for the decision took place in a former Parliament, but I can appeal to many gent. who now hear me, to consider what the principles were on which they approved the peace, and whether any thing has taken place since the treaty was concluded which would authorize them to give their vote on the present occasion for breaking the treaty and recommencing hostilities. Supposing for a moment that war was to be renewed, gent. would do well to reflect in what manner hostilities would be conducted. On this part of the subject I will not go into detail; but supposing that a determination were taken to renew the war, it is obvious that our means of annoying the enemy would consist simply in re-taking the places which by the treaty we had agreed to cede, or in retaining those still in our hands.—Now, Sir, I say distinctly, that to violate the treaty of peace for such an object as this (and under the present circumstances there is no other object which could be obtained) would be to place the ministers of this country and the members of the last parl. who had approved of the treaty in a situation to excite the ridicule of all Europe. The continuance of peace, I do contend, is infinitely desirable; I feel its importance in the strongest manner.—Adverse, however, as I am to the renewal of hostilities, I do not mean to assert that no circumstances may have followed the peace which would fully justify ministers for refusing to comply with its provisions. I am not ashamed, Sir, to avow an opinion for which I have not unfrequently been exposed to ridicule, and now explicitly to declare, that I consider the preservation of national honour to be almost the only legitimate cause of war. This doctrine I hold on the plain principle, that honour is directly and inseparably connected with self-defence. If it can be proved to me that the national honour has been insulted, or the national dignity disgraced, I will, without hesitation, declare my opinion, which is, this would be a fair legitimate cause of recommencing hostilities.—I must, however, hear a very strong case made out, before I can give my vote for re-plunging the country in those disasters which a calamitous contest had produced, and from which we were so recently delivered. Though I contend that honour is the only legitimate foundation of war, I do not mean to deny that other circumstances may come in aid of its force. As to the present circumstances of Europe, I see no ground of war, so far as this country is concerned.—There never was a period, Sir, in which this country enjoyed more internal prosperity, or more profound tranquillity; there never was a time when every consideration of the soundest policy more strongly suggested the propriety of cultivating the continuance of peace. Without referring to the calamities of the last ten years, I ask gent. fairly, whether in pursuing this policy the country ever had more fair play?—There are some persons who affect to entertain a dread of the French navy; but it is hardly possible to believe any one serious in indulging any alarm on this subject. As to the acts of the French govt. indicating a spirit of hostility to the interests of this country, I shall at present say nothing. They are not now before the House, and may be better animadverted on at another time, if any real ground of complaint actually existed. It is my own firm conviction that there is on the part of the French people, as well as the French govt. a strong desire to restore their commerce to new activity, and their manufactures to new life; and this, I believe, is the field in which, if any contest is to be carried on betwixt the two countries, they wish the dispute to be conducted. Of the result of such a rivalry, we have, Sir, surely very little room for apprehension. We have got so much the start of them, that we must take the lead; and, if they had the start of us, our superiority is so great that we could not fail speedily to overtake them. In this contest we should be certain of victory, and every intermediate step in our progress would only afford new facilities for increasing our superiority, and augmenting our improvement. It would be absurd, indeed, to pretend that this fair prospect will not be marred; but of this I am perfectly convinced, that it must be a very strong case which would justify the recommencement of hostilities, instead of employing our resources in cultivating the arts of peace. Is there a man in this House or in this country who, after the disasters which have been sustained during the progress of a wild and destructive contest, would, without continental support, again renew a contest with France, without any support but that derived from the co-operation of a few German princes, whose troops might be subsidised to engage in our cause? I trust that so extravagant a project will not again be adopted; if, contrary to every suggestion of expediency, and every dictate of policy, it should be embraced, it requires little political sagacity to foresee that the result will be incalculably disastrous. The first and grand object which we ought to have in view is security, but there can be no true security which is not upheld by honour. There can be no true dignity which is not supported by character. An hon. gent. however, finds a new ground of war in the character of the French govt. He is surprised to find it not so friendly or conciliating as he expected at the time the treaty was concluded. Did the hon. gent. Sir, really expect that the French govt. was henceforth to entertain towards this country no feelings but those of friendship? Did he imagine that we might expect from it every interchange of civility and kindness; that our govt. would find in it a powerful and disinterested ally? If such were the hon. gent's ideas, I confess myself at a loss to know on what they were grounded. There was certainly nothing in the language employed at the time when the merits of the treaty were under discussion, to countenance this supposition. The very reverse was the impression which every part of the discussion was calculated to inspire. By those high in office a very different prospect was held out to the House and the Country. A Noble Lord opposite (Ld. Hawkesbury) made use of a very remarkable expression when describing the situation in which the peace left us with relation to the other powers of Europe. He said that the continent was in a "very unsatisfactory state," a sort of language certainly by no means calculated to suggest any ideas of friendship or cordiality on the part of the French govt. The immense aggrandisement of French influence and French power is doubtless a subject of deep regret, and no man laments it more than I do. It must be lamented by every Englishman; and this very aggrandisement is with me a grand cause of accusation against the late ministers, by whose obstinacy and misconduct it was obtained. But, Sir, let gentlemen who hold this language reflect, that with the knowledge of the continent being in the state which the Noble Lord described, the treaty of peace had received the approbation of the House and the Country. Who was not aware that the power of France was increased to a degree which naturally excited jealousy on the part of this country; who did not take this into his contemplation when called upon to give his vote upon the merits of the treaty of peace? No one pretends that this was not known; but knowing this, seeing this, stating this, it is impossible for any rational man to deny that these causes for war, drawn from the state of the continent, which were now so much insisted upon, were known at the time when the treaty of peace was sanctioned—and to hold them up now as grounds of renewing the contest betwixt the two countries, was equally impolitic and unjust. There indeed remains a question how far the state of the continent, in consequence of intermediate events, was more unsatisfactory than at the time when peace was concluded. These acts, whatever their nature may be, are not now before the House, and therefore I shall not now speak to them. A great deal has been said, Sir, about the disposition of the people of this country in favour of a renewal of the war. This, I have no hesitation in affirming to be completely false. Of all the fictitious crimes which ever were imputed to the people of England, and certainly they have often been accused of crimes of which they were incapable, even in thought, I do pronounce this to be one of the most groundless that ever was invented to injure the national character. The origin of this calumny it is not difficult to trace. It arises, Sir, from the coalition of some newspapers, who affect to hold out this as the real disposition of the people. Their motives for such representations may be various. They may wish to gratify spleen, or to increase their circulation, by contriving something to excite the curiosity of their readers. I do believe in my conscience that the people of this country are, at this moment, as eager to cultivate the blessings of peace, as at any former period. Mankind, Sir, have been too often sacrificed to the ambition of princes, and to the intrigues of parties; but if the publishers of newspapers are to be the means of plunging the nation again into a destructive contest, it will be the most base and ignoble cause in which ever a people was engaged. But we are told that a most considerable body in this country are strongly actuated with a desire that the war should be renewed. The class to which I allude, are the commercial interests in all the capital trading towns throughout the country, but more especially in the metropolis. To this representation I am not disposed to give my assent. The merchants in this country are too liberal, and too respectable a body of men to have any wish to replunge their country into all those calamities, from which she has just begun to emerge, from any hope of gain arising from contracts with govt., or from any of the other means of emolument which spring out of a state of war, and which to one class are the sources of aggrandisement, while to the community they are only pregnant with misery. If, however, the fact is as gent. represent it, I should feel disposed almost to wish the reverse of those ages of splendid achievement which distinguished the history of antiquity. If human beings are to perish to gratify any passion of our nature, I should rather that their blood should flow to gratify the romantic ambition of Alexander, than to fill the coffers of a cold calculating body of unfeeling merchants; let us not be accused, Sir, of a wish to renew those disasters which for ten years have desolated Europe, to open afresh those wounds which have so long afflicted suffering humanity; let us not disturb the peace of the continent when our interference could produce no beneficial effect. When there is not a single power ready to second our efforts, let us not by a rash step forfeit those blessings which are indispensably and eternally connected with a state of peace. Great enterprises, which might in my opinion with much more propriety be styled rash actions, are flattering in prospect, but disastrous in the result, spectata eventus tristia. We are now in a state of domestic tranquillity, of flattering internal prosperity, and when our commerce, as far as the nature of human affairs justifies anticipation, might become daily more extended. There is one other point, Sir, on which I shall make one or two observations. At the commencement of the late war, the House, and I believe, I may add, the Country, were as it were hurried into the contest by the expectation that the struggle was one which would not be arduous during its continuance, or protracted in its duration. Fatal experience has, however, sufficiently demonstrated the fallacy of such anticipations. I hope, Sir, we shall not again be hurried into any new war on the expectation of its only lasting one campaign. If we again engage in war, it is surely matter of importance to weigh well the nature and the consequence of such a step, and I trust that ministers will feel this importance before they once more give up the certain benefits of repose for the uncertain chances of war.—With respect to the present administration, I believe that it is almost unnecessary for me to say that I have no sort of connexion with them. I thank them for having made peace, and I hope they approve the treaty which they formerly concluded. If we have made peace, I trust it is in the true spirit of peace; I do not mean to accuse them of any design of concluding a treaty under peculiar circumstances, and afterwards availing themselves of some change to refuse compliance with its conditions, to undo all that has been done, to retain and retake all the settlements which were previously agreed to be ceded. The power of France is unquestionably too great; but it is not increased to such a degree since the peace was concluded as to justify a rupture. The interference of France in the German indemnities is a subject of complaint. Did ministers not know, Sir, that there was an interference naturally to be expected? By not being parties to the treaty of Luneville, did we not know that France would interfere in the subject of the German indemnities, and what reasonable ground of complaint now exists? The language of the late ministers was explicit: they told us, Sir, that it was not for the interests of this country to treat in conjunction with Austria. She had consulted her separate interests, and we were freed from our engagements. As we were unwilling to share in the advantages, we had no right to complain of consequences easily foreseen, and of effects easily anticipated. France, as might have been expected, did interfere in the arrangement of the German indemnities, and Russia has been induced to join in the same object. I do not mean to go into any minute illustration on this subject. I content myself with a general observation, which is, that this interference is in some points of view not unfavourable to the interests of this country, as they may be collaterally affected. I have only to conclude with expressing my ardent hope, that peace is the first object of the govt. as I am convinced it is the strongest wish of the people.

Mr. CANNING said, he was a friend to the Address, on the principle that it recommended a system of vigour which seemed too long to have been wanting in our national counsels. Respecting the propriety of such preparations as might enable us to meet any emergency which might occur, he was convinced there could not be two opinions among the real friends of the country. He had, however, serious objections to some of the expressions contained in the Address. He thought that it called on the House to extend to ministers too much implicit confidence, and presumed, from the disposition they had already manifested to preserve peace, in favour of their exertions to promote the continuance of so desirable an object. It seemed to be taken for granted, that all had been done that could be done for the preservation of peace; but some explanation was necessary before this could be fully admitted. All had not been done to preserve peace, if nothing had been done with firmness, while every thing was marked by the spirit of conciliation. All had not been done, if remonstrance was not accompanied by dignified threats of following it up with a corresponding conduct. All had not been done, if demands were made only to be rejected, if concessions were required which were haughtily refused, if a shew of manliness was assumed from which there was no dignified retreat, after the mortification of disappointment. He was afraid that conduct of this kind had not been altogether wanting on the part of ministers. It was a matter of public notoriety, that on the subject of the execrable treatment of the French govt. to Switzerland, a remonstrance had been presented in a manner totally inconsistent with policy or expediency. In saying this, he begged it to be understood that it was a thing the most remote from his wishes to have it imagined that he did not feel a lively interest in the fate of a brave and suffering people, or that he was deficient in a sentiment of honest indignation against the foulest oppression which had stained the history of a period marked by the most unjustifiable attacks on the liberty and independence of foreign nations. The Swiss had afforded to Europe a glorious example of the heroic efforts of men combating for liberty; and he trusted that if ever the time came, as in so awful a crisis as the present it might come, we should in defence of our rights discover a spirit no less courageous, and meet with a success correspondent to the energy of our exertions. In estimating the propriety of a remonstrance, such as that to which he now alluded, the wisdom of such a measure was to be determined only by circumstances. Its expediency was dependent on extended views of policy, and enlarged prospects of advantage. It was true, indeed, that when the intelligence of the glorious exertions of the Swiss patriots reached this country, every honest man was interested in their exertions, every lover of freedom was ready to devote himself in their cause. Ministers, however, were not to be guided by a popular impulse, however respectable. They were to consider how far their remonstrances, in favour of a suffering people, were likely to be attended to, or how far they could hope to enforce them, by holding out to the French govt. threats of employing force, in case peaceable remonstrance was ineffectual.—The whole history of States sufficiently proved that remonstrances betwixt independent nations, unaccompanied by penalties, were generally nugatory. Now, on what footing did the remonstrance of ministers, in the case of Switzerland, stand? It arrived at a time when it was fruitless—the people were subjugated, and their hopes were blasted for ever. But, supposing that it had not been presented too late, had ministers made any arrangements on the continent to give it effect? Were any allies ready to second our efforts? Was the co-operation of the Court of Vienna secured, or was an Austrian army ready to march to the frontiers of Switzerland? No allies were formed; and we seemed to take as little trouble about collecting an Austrian army as calling a coach from the stand. In this point of view the measure of a remonstrance was unwise, impolitic, inexpedient. But there was another important point of view in which it may be considered, in which it was no less objectionable. It appeared as an insulated measure, and not a part of a system on which they meant to conduct his Majesty's counsels. He begged leave to ask, whether, on being first disclosed, it did not create the utmost astonishment in the public mind? When the merits of the treaty were canvassed, the language of ministers and their friends had been, that the system of continental connexion was to be greatly relaxed, and the country were congratulated on being freed from so pregnant a source of war. An hon. friend of his (Mr. Wilberforce) had not contented himself with expatiating on this change of policy with exultation in the House, but had addressed the same language to his constituents on a late occasion. The sanction of so respectable a name could not be without its share of influence, and certainly the public had been strongly impressed with the idea of this change of system. He had to blame ministers if they meant to act on the system which had received the sanction of the greatest politicians of this country, because they did not prepare the public for a change so very important. It was at all times proper that the people should be thoroughly apprised of the principles which govt. had resolved to act upon, because without this there never could be a cordial co-operation. When ministers, contrary to their original professions, had determined to act on the old principle of continental alliances and connexions, they ought to have given fair notice to Europe; but above all, they ought to have given fair notice to the people of England. It gave him great satisfaction to hear that ministers were now determined to act with vigour; but though friendly to the Address, he could not help thinking that past experience did not warrant implicit confidence in the energy and decision of Ministers. Contrary to all preceding example, nothing had characterised the reduction of our peace establishment, but a precipitation altogether unaccountable. New encroachments on the part of France were met by conciliation; new accessions of strength were succeeded by new diminutions of our national force. There was nothing like a reciprocity in the arrangement of a peace estab. Ministers now admitted their mistake, and they were forced to do that with difficulty which formerly they could have accomplished without effort. It was unnecessary for him to point out to the House that it was a work of considerable labour to recruit a disbanded army, to refit a dismantled fleet; but, whatever the difficulty was, it was wholly to be ascribed to want of promptness, decision, and energy in watching over the ambitious designs of the enemy. Of all the bad consequences of this policy, nothing was so bad as letting down the national spirit. To repair the consequences of this error, was not the work of a day. National spirit was not to be roused in a moment. It was to be cherished and fostered by the paternal care of govt. Ministers had neglected this most important object, and now they wished to repair the consequences of their error, and to raise the spirit as high as it was when they received the govt. from the hands of their predecessors. A great deal had been said at different times of the desperate state of public affairs when his Majesty's present ministers had been entrusted with their management. This observation, often repeated, he had at all times most strongly controverted. He was ready to go into a detail on every point, and to prove that in every particular it was unfounded. What were the circumstances under which ministers undertook a situation represented as hazardous beyond all former example? They had left to them a war with France, and the neutral question in such a state as to afford no prospect of accommodation without an appeal to the sword. But what were the means they were furnished with to meet these objects? For enforcing our right on the neutral question, they had a fleet prepared to strike an immediate and decisive blow. To finish the war with France, they had the Egyptian expedition in readiness for immediate service. They, to all the advantages arising from success, did not unite any of the dangers connected with responsibility. They were entrusted with the government of a country in a state of complete repose. Treason in Ireland was destroyed, domestic sedition was repressed, commerce extended beyond all example, manufactures active, finances unimpaired, were the prominent circumstances in the situation of the country when they were first called to his Majesty's councils; and certainly though their duties were arduous, their facilities of performance were numerous and striking.—He, at the same time, stated with great energy the hostile views of the French govt. to this country. The destruction of our independence and glory was the object never lost sight of for a moment. There was an invincible spirit of rancour which only waited for a favourable opportunity to display itself in action. The sentiment of hatred was cherished—the day of vengeance was only postponed—the purpose was taken, and in due time the French govt. would disclose its views.—Telum auctum et reconditum promeret.—The R. H. member concluded by exhibiting a succinct view of the deficiency of ministers in their diplomatic transactions, which he illustrated with particular reference to Russia, whose alliance had been unaccountably lost under the most favourable circumstances.

LORD HAWKESBURY said, he could not agree with the hon. gent. opposite to him, (Mr. Fox), in some points he had stated, nor with his R. H. Friend, (Mr. Canning) in others. He agreed with many of the sentiments which had been delivered by Mr. Fox; but he did not agree with that hon. gent. that the events which had happened since the signing of the preliminary treaty of peace between this country and France, might not, in the opinion of many persons, create a material difference in the relative situation of the two countries, for certainly France did not then stand in the situation in which it stood now. In stating this, his Lordship observed, that he did not mean to enter at present on the question, of whether it was wise in his Majesty's ministers to conclude the peace on the terms on which it was concluded, nor to enter into any comparison between the events as they stood then, with the events that have happened since the peace. It was said at the conclusion of the peace, he believed by him, that it was right then to close the account of the war, and that with all the conditions upon which it was then made, he had added, it would be wise to look always on the further encroachments of France with jealousy and watchfulness; and he had said also, that much might depend upon the chance there was of success in endeavouring to stop it. He wished not to apply this to the present case, but the distinction which that observation was intended to convey, was material. He could not agree with his R. H. Friend who had just sat down, in the allusion he made to what he had supposed to have been said by him (Lord H.) when the subject-matter of the preliminary and definitive treaties were discussed in that House. He regretted, that his R. H. Friend was not present at that discussion, so that he had not an opportunity of knowing precisely, the sentiments on which that definitive treaty was defended by his Majesty's ministers, for, by the representation he made of that matter, and his arguments from that representation, it was evident he had, in some respects, misconceived the grounds on which his Majesty's ministers defended that treaty in its discussion in that House. His R. H. Friend asked, what the system was on which ministers had acted, and whether they had relinquished the system on which they had concluded the treaty? To this he answered, that his Majesty's ministers acted now precisely on the same system as they acted when the definitive treaty was concluded. That the principle which was then avowed was the principle which would govern them; it was a principle which was perfectly clear and intelligible, and practicable. That principle was stated by the hon. gent. opposite to him, as far as the statement went, with perfect fairness—it was that, as far as respects the interests of this country, the peace was made on terms that were honourable, inasmuch as it preserved the integrity of the British dominions; and it was added, at the time of the discussion of that treaty, by some who took a share in it on the part of his Majesty's ministers, that, as far as it respected the state of the continent, many things were left under circumstances that were unsatisfactory, and ministers had expressed regret upon that occasion, and in terms that were stronger than the hon. gent. opposite to him had stated to-night upon that topic. The principle on which his Majesty's ministers justified themselves then was this, "That to continue the war for continental objects, without the prospect of continental support, would be absurd, and that consequently it was better to take the chance of peace, than the chance of war—That if we were to have the alternative, it was desirable for us to try peace, when in continental objects, our expectations had ceased."—This was the principle on which his Majesty's ministers then acted. It was the principle by which they now act, and on which they would always be ready to act, and to justify themselves. He knew that his R. H. Friend who had spoken last had alluded to some general topics, and referred to the opinions of other persons as to the system which ministers ought to pursue, and who did not agree with ministers. But he had mistaken some sentiments which were uttered by him (Lord H.) It was stated as if something was said on the discussion of the definitive treaty, that it was the policy of this country to abstract itself from the continent. That was not the principle then avowed; but he remembered having said something very different himself on that occasion, and he was ready to defend what he then said. He had said, it was not the system of this country to abstract itself from continental concerns, and attend exclusively to its own resources and internal affairs; he should have thought, if some respectable persons had not expressed a contrary opinion, that the case was too clear for any doubt to be entertained upon it. He owned, that to a country so large, and territories so extensive, commerce so great, and interests so complicated, it was impossible to apply, with good sense, the principle of abstracting itself, and to attend to mere internal policy of its own, distinct from all concern with the affairs of other states, upon all occasions. Those who should ever attempt to guide the affairs of this country upon a contracted system, would soon find it a policy which they must abandon, or sacrifice the real interests of this country. He might object to this system on a more large and extensive principle than any he had hitherto mentioned, but it was not his intention to be diffuse in what he had to submit to the House. He knew he might allude to what had been the practice of his Majesty's ministers; that was a subject on which he felt more delicacy than otherwise he would have of difficulty in the detail. He thought, however, that the affairs of states, like the affairs of individuals, took their course from the circumstances and importance in which they stood.—States that were in size and consequence of a subordinate kind, had to follow a rule of policy different from that which would be a wise one to a great and important state. Inferior or subordinate states, like inferior and subordinate individuals, had to look chiefly to maintenance and support, often little more than preservation of existence. But individuals of rank and station, of high condition in life, had the support and assistance of others to attend to; the concerns of others and interests of others to consider, and, in some cases, to provide for.—So in states.—Great and powerful states had to look to many things besides their own immediate and internal interest; both policy and justice required that they should attend to other objects, for the interest of a great and powerful state was often combined with those who were inferior to it, as well as in endeavouring to set some limits to another power, and therefore it was to him a matter of surprise, that any person of an enlarged understanding should suppose it could, under any circumstances, be the interest of this country to pursue an abstract system, unconnected with any part of the affairs of the continent. This, he presumed, would be an answer to that part of the speech of his R. H. Friend which tended to imply, that the policy of his Majesty's ministers was that of an abstract insulated nature. But still there might be circumstances that ought to govern his Majesty's ministers. That the policy which he had already stated, was that on which his Majesty's ministers had, in some cases, acted, in others forbore to act, was a point which it was almost unnecessary for him to state. It was so fresh in the recollection of all who heard him, that this policy of attending to expediency, had governed this and other states in the concerns of kingdoms—one of a recent date; it was the case of a nation, not much less than that of France itself, in point of territory at the time—more populous than several of the then independent states of Europe, and yet that vast nation had been blotted out of the map of Europe, as an independent state. It must be obvious to the House that he alluded to Poland. Upon that occasion, there was, in that House, and in this country, but one feeling, and yet it had been held, not only by ministers, but also by a considerable body of those who opposed them, that this nation ought not to go to war on that ground.—He did not believe that any considerable body of men blamed ministers for their conduct on that occasion.—Why? Because whatever pretence it might furnish afterwards for continuing a contest that might be inevitable, it was unadvisable at that time, however desirable, because it was impossible for us to have interfered, with any chance of success, without continental support. From the state of Europe, at that time, under all the circumstances that must inevitably have been connected with war, there was no reasonable hope of success, in any efforts of ours, without continental support, which we could not then have; and, therefore, however just in itself, or desirable the thing might be, there was nothing to warrant our active interference. Another transaction was to be found in the history of Europe, which was more immediately connected with the direct interest of this country, on the subject of continental policy. It was that of the conduct of King Wm. III. under all the good qualities of that prince and his admired general policy, and when the political system of this country was established, on the wisest footing. He meant the great point by which the ambition of Louis the XIVth appeared on the death of the King of Spain, on the war of succession, upon the will of the King of Spain. It was then declared, by King Wm. to be the policy of this country, under all the circumstances, not to interfere alone in that question, so as to involve this country in a war, without continental support; and this was the opinion of a prince, who, from his education and habits, was certainly prone to an interference in continental affairs. In a word, it was his opinion, that without continental support this country ought not to interfere in continental concerns on the ground of expediency; but this was a totally distinct thing from any abstract insulated policy.—It was a policy founded on the reason of the thing, arising out of circumstances over which we had no controul. With regard to the circumstances of the present moment, and what would have been wise for his Majesty's ministers to do, that was, as he had said already, a question of more delicacy than difficulty for him to speak upon—he should, however, speak in general terms upon that topic. He would say, that the conduct of his Majesty's ministers was governed by a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, by a due consideration of the value of objects, of the then peace, and of the state of the continent at the time. Putting the first point for a moment out of the question, many observations might be made on the state of the continent. It might be well worth consideration, whether, if they thought that the objects themselves were such, as would deserve the renewal of hostilities, and we were determined to take that course, it was probable, at this moment, we should have any effectual support? This was a point which must be governed by a variety of considerations; and he had no difficulty in saying, that although, after a war, such as that which had been closed, with the magnified state of France, peace was, under all circumstances, desirable; yet he should have rejoiced, and he believed that every reflecting man in this country would have rejoiced, if, by a wise, temperate, and firm conduct in the other powers of Europe, a barrier could have been put to further encroachment; but at present, from points, some of which had been foreseen at the time of making peace—he meant particularly some questions as to the indemnities, which must give to France advantages in all continental discussions of this kind; many evils arose which were unavoidable. It was not necessary for him, at this time, to consider the question of indemnities, though there was much injustice, yet, perhaps, something of the kind was inevitable. It was a system of indemnity, so called, and nothing more. But so it happened, that the moment the discussion was opened, France had it in her power to hold out immediate advantages to some states, which made them less vigilant than they should be of the general interests of Europe; so that in this respect a system was established which was not to the interest of this country. But what was most material to be considered was this, if continental connexions must be had with a view to such a renewal of hostilities, if it should ever become necessary, by a hasty and a premature renewal, we should lose all the advantages of a well concerted system. This was not a point on which he wished to hold out any expectation to the House; he could not with propriety do so if he had any grounds for it; but the House would feel the propriety of the principle which he had laid down, as a rule to guide this proceeding. He wished to be most distinctly understood, as maintaining the opinion, "that under the present circumstances of this country, and of Europe, if peace can be maintained, consistently with honour to ourselves, under a proper defensive system, it is, under all circumstances, better than a renewal of the war, even connected with a consideration of all the events which have happened. His R. H. Friend had stated some words of his, used on the discussion of the defin. treaty, respecting the national spirit of this country at that time. His ldp. said, he did not state the sentiment in the insulated manner mentioned by his R. H. Friend; yet he did state then, and he believed now, that if a sufficient case was made of injustice to us, but not only of injustice, but also with a reasonable expectation of success, the spirit of the people was fully equal to any contest in which we might be engaged; yet, that after ten years war, carried on so extensively and so variously in its course, the spirit of the people did require, in some degree, recruiting; and therefore, under all the circumstances, peace, if made with honour, it would have been wise to make, even on terms less advantageous than might have been expected at the first year of a war—but this did not apply, exclusively, to this country, it was applicable to the whole Continent of Europe, which consequently required recruiting, to give a chance of success in the contest, an object deserving great regard. He thought he had a manifestation of public sentiment upon this occasion, as upon other occasions, which proved that if a renewal of hostilities became inevitable, however desirable peace might be, yet the spirit of the people would be fully equal to the contest. With regard to the allusion of his R. H. Friend to a supposed transaction by which the honour of this country was committed and forfeited, he could freely say, that no step whatever had been taken which committed or forfeited the honour of this country. What steps had been taken by the govt. of this country, it would be improper for him to disclose; but it would be an extraordinary proposition to entertain, that we never were to bring on the discussion with a foreign govt. on any point, if we were not afterwards to state that unless it was conceded to you, you would go to war. He would correct the statement of his R. H. Friend on another point, for he seemed to have gone upon an idea, that the resistance of Switzerland was instigated by this country, or that after the commencement of that resistance, that his Majesty's govt. did interfere and held out encouragement to that resistance. He thought it important to say, that no part of this event was instigated by the govt. of this country; not only that the resistance was not instigated in that case, but also, that no encouragement whatever, after its commencement, was given by this country. The two other hon. gent. who spoke early in this debate, seemed to look at the present situation of Europe with some dissatisfaction. They had stated that some events had taken place which might have been foreseen, and they seemed to distrust, in some respect, the firmness and sufficiency of his Majesty's present ministers to conduct the affairs of the country at the present crisis; and they accompanied this observation with a reference in particular to the abilities of a right hon. gent. (Mr. Pitt) who was prevented by indisposition from being in his place in the House this day.—In every thing they could say, continued his ldp. with reference to the abilities and the services he has performed to his country, he will find no person more ready than myself to agree with them.—It is impossible for me to let this subject pass over entirely in silence, especially after what has been said by my R. H. Friend who spoke last—I certainly approve of the measures of that right hon. gent. (Mr. Pitt)—I have proved it by voting for them; but it is not always in the power of the greatest abilities to command success. I think I may say that the events which happened towards the close of that administration is a proof of that observation, and, therefore, I felt the more surprised, as I believe the House did, when my R. H. Friend (Mr. Canning) stated circumstances as if the condition of this country was, at the time of the close of that administration, the most flourishing, the most prosperous, the best calculated for the continuance of war, or for the making of peace, that was ever known—Such as any persons of the most ambitious temper for applause would wish to come in at the head of govt.; as a state in which it was of all conditions, the most easy to conduct our affairs.—With regard to that event, I know that no motive did actuate him (Mr. Pitt) in quitting govt. but a sense of what he thought a superior duty—a matter of opinion on a great and important question; but is it possible to forget, what was the state of events at that time? Does my R. H. Friend recollect the state of this country then—with a great combination of almost all Europe against us, with the exception of the cabinet of Vienna to be sure, but which could not support us, so much as by words? Does he recollect the great dismay felt as to various events, when myself, and those with whom I have the honour of acting, succeeded to that administration? I allude to the question with the Northern Powers, which led to the battle of Copenhagen. It is well known, that other powers were strongly attached, to what was called the neutral code—and even after the battle of Copenhagen, and the death of the Emp. Paul, no point could be attended with more difficulty than that question was. With regard to another event brought forward by my R. H. Friend, the expedition to Egypt, I will venture to affirm, that no man ever applauded that expedition more than I do, or who thinks, that under all the circumstances, it was not the wisest disposition that could be made of our force at the time; but to state it as my hon. friend has done, as one in which the event was certain, considering the comparative force of the French, the difficulties which our force had to encounter, and the whole of the detail of that expedition, is what I own astonishes me.—I know that every war and every expedition in war, implies a great portion of risk, and that in moral certainties in such cases, we do not mean absolute and physical certainties. I believe this expedition was the best mode in which the country could, at that period, have employed that force. I believe, too, that the event contributed to the establishment of peace. But if my R. H. Friend consults the military officers employed in that expedition, he will find it was not at the commencement of the present administration an event that had any certainty about it. My R. H. Friend made an allusion to a passage in the King's Speech, and in the Address commented upon by the hon. gent. opposite to me (Mr. Fox), in which my R. H. Friend seemed to consider that the assent given to the observation of that hon. gent. by us, implied that we agreed with him on the subject of the peace estab. of this country—our assent on that occasion, was, undoubtedly to the explanation of that hon. gent. in that particular; for he stated that all the Address went to, was to concur in all measures necessary for the interest of the country.—The hon. gent. opposite to him, had said, that in his opinion, that would be best supported by a small peace establishment, but that other individuals had other opinions upon that subject, and it would be time enough to discuss the amount of the establishment when it came to be proposed, and it was a point on which difference of opinion was likely to arise; and it was only to the expression of that sentiment that any assent was given by ministers. But I have no difficulty in stating it as my own opinion, that in the present state of the Continent, it is impossible that the peace establishment of this country, should not far exceed what it usually was; and that if doubts could have been entertained on that subject, events which have happened since the defin. treaty, have decided that question. One word to another part of my R. H. Friend's speech, and which was also alluded to by the two hon. gent. who followed the mover and seconder of this Address, namely—the state in which this country now is as to naval and military force. They seemed to think that our military force has been imprudently disbanded, and our fleets dismantled; but the truth of that matter is, that there never was before this time, the first year of a peace, when the peace establishment of this country was any thing like so considerable as it is now, and particularly the navy—nor was there ever a period in which the navy of France was so reduced. My R. H. Friend states, that what he looks to, is not the state or condition of the terms of peace between the two countries, but the animus. If we look to the animus alone, and were not to have peace until we were satisfied upon that particular, I am afraid we never should have had peace at all, either from the monarchy of France or from its present govt. I think it is manifest from the terms of the three last treaties of peace we have concluded with France, compared with their conduct, that at the very time of signing, they meditated a breach of them.—The animus is therefore out of the case; and if we stand until we were satisfied on the mind and intention of France towards us being pacific, whatever opportunity might occur to favour hostility, we should continue at war for ever.—An hon. gent. spoke in the course of this debate as if he had some doubts respecting the prosperous state of our commerce: he is connected with a part of our country deeply concerned in that matter; but when accounts came to be laid before the House upon that subject, I am confident the information which they will afford will be perfectly satisfactory to that hon. gent. as well as the House and the Public, and will prove, that nothing which has hitherto been advanced in favour of the state of our commerce, has been without foundation. To preserve peace, and to give to the country an opportunity to improve its great resources, both has been, and will be, the policy of his Majesty's ministers: but they cannot look to the events which have lately happened, without calling on this House and on the Country, equally to entertain a spirit of watchfulness on the state of Europe, and to be prepared for the alternative. Our policy has been, and will be, to resist unjust demands made by any foreign power. The stand must be made in the first instance, and to preserve peace as long as we can, consistently with that policy, and with a due attention to the circumstances of Europe, is the object of his Majesty's ministers. Undoubtedly, the situation of Europe, whatever may be ascribed to particular persons, has fundamentally changed, even in principle, by an extraordinary revolution which has taken place in so considerable a part of this world; a revolution which, although it may have ceased in some respects in its original spot, could not have ceased to affect other powers, and that must be subject of regret to every lover of his country.—But it is not always in our power to redress what we feel to be a grievance. I trust the conduct of his Majesty's govt. will be such as to satisfy the country; and as they are governed by no principle now, but that which governed them at the time of agreeing to the peace, they will continue to maintain the honour and the interest of the country, by preserving that principle, which has always been held in the greatest esteem among us by the most enlightened and ardent lovers of its welfare.

MR. WINDHAM. [This is but a very imperfect sketch of what Mr. Windham said on this occasion. We have taken the best report that was published; but, in a long debate, where there are many speakers, the best report must, of necessity, be very deficient, both as to quantity and to correctness.] “I do not rise to make any observations upon the general doctrine advanced by the noble lord who has just sat down; so far from thinking it unsatisfactory, I shall be content with even less than it holds forth. My purpose in rising is to offer a few words upon the general state of the country, and upon the address. Considering the speech from the throne, and the address, which is its echo, as the speech and address of the minister, our situation is alarming indeed, when on the very first day of a session we are told of insults and strides on the part of France, which require extraordinary jealousy and precaution, but if these things have not been foreseen, if this be the first impression which govt. has had of them, then are we lost indeed. It seems as if an hon. gent.'s powers (Mr. Fox) lose all their energy, when touching upon the French revolution. At its commencement, he told us there was nothing extraordinary in the French revolution; that there was nothing so simple and easy in a state, as a change from one form of govt. to another. The ship, says he, is in stays; she is now on a tack, but you need not be afraid, she will sail safe into port without falling foul of you. This was his language in the beginning of the revolution. But when this "stupendous monument of human wisdom" was raised, then he thought it was of importance to us; for in these great edifices, if the foundation be not good, and the walls be not perpendicular, they may fall and spread ruin wide around them. At the beginning, it was as innocent a thing as ever came into the world, it was one of those things that become vicious by ill treatment; and yet, when grown up, it has destroyed all before it, as well that which did not, as that which did offend it. Those that lay in its way; and those who did not wilfully resist, it alike overthrew. We may, indeed, apply the words of Shakespeare, as an image of its conduct—"You beat the blind boy, and the blind boy beats the post."—Since the peace, France has conquered Piedmont; she has conquered even the hon. gent.'s old friend, the Duke of Tuscany; and yet, he says, she is only a commercial rival. I should be glad to know, from the hon. gent. how long the two countries are to go on in this way of commercial rivalry? Has France no power to engage in any other sort of rivalry? Is any man prepared to say, that she has not? What, after country has fallen upon country; when messenger comes in upon messenger, as in the last scene of a tragedy, to announce some new calamity; and these events so rapidly follow each other, that the news is stale when a day old; is it for the hon. gent. to rise and say, France is only a commercial rival? When I say the country betrays every mark of dissolution, when I represent it as going the way of all flesh, and when I am asked, why I think so? I am disposed to ask those who doubt me, why they think otherwise. That I think is the more natural question of the two, and I illustrate it thus: suppose a man for some years in another world should inquire of a person recently arrived from this, about the state of this family of Europe. He would be told, that of the 20 nations that he formerly knew, there were only four or five remaining in an independent state: that Flanders was annexed to France; Prussia, though nominally independent, entirely under her influence; Spain, her vassal; Portugal, at her mercy; Genoa, in name and reality, the property of France; Switzerland just fallen;

and Modena, Parma, in short the whole of Italy all gone; that Austria was so feeble she dare not move a step, and the whole of Germany partitioned and divided; would not such a person, if an Englishman, after being told all this, pause before he put the question upon the fate of England? Would it not be more natural for him to suppose that it had shared the fate of the rest, than that it should have survived such general ruin? This, then, is the case, as matter of mere calculation upon the number of states; but how much more strong does it become, when, in addition to the number of fallen powers, it is considered that the infection is of that nature, that the more it has destroyed, the more able it becomes to destroy more. The cases are precisely the same. The proof then is not upon us to shew that we have not perished, but upon the others, to shew why we have not. It is merely a question of Cocker, namely, if in a given time France has destroyed so many powers, in what length of time will she be able to destroy the remainder? But the case is stronger still; for not only has she the same force to destroy, but she possesses it in an increased proportion, which is inversely as the resistance, so that France goes on to the attainment of her object in a ratio compounded of these two quantities, her power to destroy, which is equal, and the quantity of resistance, which is constantly diminishing. See then at what rate France has gone for the last six months, and you will find at what rate she will go in future. This is that compound increasing rate I have mentioned, unless it will be said that she moves only at that rate in time of peace, which enables her to take an extraordinary start; a case which I shall leave to others to explain. But it may be said that the peace will stop it. As well might it be said that the conclusion of the last century could stop it. Take out the map of Europe, and measure not leagues, but climates and degrees, and see how much France possesses in Europe. Russia is also a power of great extent, but nothing to France in population.—France, including her own people, and those under her immediate influence, has the use of a population of between 50 and 60 millions, amounting to half the population of Europe. She has been always a more populous country than this; as her population amounted to 24 millions; but, formerly there existed circumstances which counterbalanced this excess of population. Now, however, that counterbalance is destroyed, and we have the whole of her population against us, together with what we have lost, and she has gained upon the continent. With respect to the nature and situation of territory, it may lay remote and detached, as that of Russia, which extends into the north of Asia, and so cannot be brought into effect. The population may also be timid and feeble, like the Asiatics, with whom we have been fighting; but is that the character, I ask, of the people of France, or of the nations whom she has overthrown? Looking at this I must exclaim with Macbeth—

"Can such things be,

"And overcome us like a summer cloud,

"Without our special wonder? You make me

"strange,

"Even to the disposition that I owe,

"When now I think you can behold such sights,

"And keep the natural ruby of your cheeks,

"When mine are blanch'd with fear."

This is the feeling with which I look at this part of our relative situation. Look now at the other side. The first effect of the peace was a reduction of our expense, and a great saving, as if our wealth was expected thereby to grow faster than the power of France, and consequently improve our situation; and, with this view, the reduction of our naval establishment after the treaty of Amiens was so rapid as to place us in our present perilous situation, to say no worse of it. This prospect of gain is however likely to fail us, for if they see that they keep us between high and low armament: they may do away all our savings, just as a man might spend as much on a journey to Hounslow or Windsor on as one to Edinburgh.—But if we are to weigh gold against the sword, and commerce against continental politics, and if trade shall go on in a prosperous course, will that satisfy the statesman? I shall always give merchants credit for their good wishes to the country, but on a question of this kind they are not the best authority, as being interested parties. The merchants look to present gain, but they may be bad guardians of the country in relation to its future prosperity, just as tenants of church lands, who have short interests, are inattentive to their future improvement. I shall not, however, go into the detail of trade on this subject, but content myself with a general view which may be more correct. I ask then by what rule or law of nations, all trade shall centre in our ports, and France possess imperial power? I wish it to be considered, that France remaining as she is, may destroy its source, and break it up at once by a new war. France acts upon this ground; and with this view, she has taken great naval and commercial stations in all parts of the world. She has proceeded as an engineer in the time of Louis XIV. would proceed, choosing what fortresses it would be advisable to destroy, and what to keep and improve. In this spirit, she forms her commercial establishments in every part of the world, and hangs every where upon the sources of our wealth. That these will not soon grow up, is what no man can dispute—France may then prescribe to us in our commerce, and cut and carve out our trade with other nations, as she shall think proper. This is the rivalry in which the hon. gent. as a declared supporter of the peace, sees no danger. He appeals to the trader, and not to the trader; the present trade may approve, because he may have an interest; but the ultimate system may be ruined. To say that France may not hereafter injure our navy or our trade, possessing, as she does, such naval and commercial stations, no man can venture; and as our navy and our trade helped each other up, so they may help each other down. If, however, it should be asked, of what importance is this danger of rivalry in trade at a remote distance? to that, I answer—we must consider we are running a race with a wolf, who, though we may not be able to run him down, may turn short upon us. Now it may be said, to what does all this lead? To this I answer, it leads to a just sense and view of our internal situation, which is the source of all manly resolution and prudent conduct. In the alternative of peace or war, we cannot understand the reasons for the one but in the other. The reasons for war we have now found out in the peace. We are like the testy old bachelor, who took a wife, and exclaimed, "Aye, aye, now that I am married, I have found out what is the matter with me." So with us, we have now discovered the reasons for war in the peace. We have always talked of these two states as if, because they are opposite in their nature, they must have opposite effects; that if war was bad for the country peace must be advantageous. There may be danger in both states. You may be so unprosperous in a war that it may not be in your power to make peace. This was nearly the case of the last war, which was unsuccessful in relation to some of the objects assigned for it. In my view of it, however, it was not unsuccessful; for what I say is, that we are in a better situation than if it had never been undertaken. It has not, however, enabled us to make peace with France with safety, and in that view it has been unsuccessful, and left a cause for much anxiety.—France is now a great power, with the means of increasing it. I suppose then that we thence understand our situation; that we are engaged with a rival who means our destruction, and to make its accomplishment the last of her Herculean labours. When the hon. member talked of the pacific disposition of France, and deprecated the wars of princes, but not one word about the wars of the First Consul. I thought he had brought over some friendly remonstrance; for, says he, in what has France violated the treaty of Amiens? I did not think that any casuist would argue that there are not grounds for war exclusive of the treaty of Amiens, and that it is only a question of prudence. Now, if he had said, that whatever might be the ambition of Buonaparté, the public opinion in France was pacific, and would controul his design, this would be a security; but, in contemplating that astonishing monument of human wisdom, the name of the people in that free country has never been once mentioned by the hon. gent. We see, then, that his ambition is not restrained by public opinion, and hence it has been able to make such havoc. But, so far as public opinion goes, when I consider the language and addresses presented to the First Consul, as demonstrative of it, I must believe the accounts of the well informed people, who have lately returned from that country, all of whom assert, that the great sentiment there is the destruction of England, to which they ascribe all the ills that they have suffered; an idea which they have been taught to cherish by those who have so often invigilized against the late unjust and unnecessary war, as they have stiled it. Now, to come to the chain of commerce, credit and capital, although the changes have been rung upon these three things as distinct, upon a nearer view they may be comprehended under the head of commerce singly, and it is at this that France aims. See, then, what she has done to attain it. Since the peace she has built 13 ships of war, 6 of the line and 7 frigates, and she has imported 10,000 tons of hemp, which is equal to a year's consumption of the British navy in time of war.—Never was there a greater expedition than that which he sent to St. Domingo, and all this she has been enabled to do by the Brit. credit, and partly by Brit. ships. Added to these, she is now preparing another expedition from Holland. We heard much at the time of peace of the poverty of France, and her inability to engage in such undertakings; but we now find she can avail herself of Brit. credit to accomplish them. It was then argued, as if we might go on in our commerce quietly and unmolested, but she now sees she can break up our system whenever she pleases. On the other hand, we also begin to understand our situation. Men who wished to stop these results have been called men of blood, disturbers of the western family. A surgeon may advise an amputation without being a man of blood. The patient may wish it without being a man of blood. A kind sympathising husband and father may recommend these experiments without being monsters. No; these are the monsters, these who, when the fond mother had by an exertion of her tenderness summoned up resolution to suffer an operation upon her child, and to comfort and encourage it by her presence, could revile her and say, see that unnatural mother holding her child while a barbarous surgeon mangles its tender limbs. Now, one does not like this language from the mother of revolutions. (A laugh!) One does not like to hear this pious horror recommended by a revolution, with twenty others in its belly; a revolution which, like a certain piece of fire-work, which bursts in its ascent, and showers down a multitude of others. There is something in the boasted title of pacificator, so ludicrous, that it excites contempt. It is like the cant slang, so much in use with smugglers, robbers, and gypsies. With such people, smuggling is called a free trade, skipping a hedge moonshine, and running away at night. I remember a set of thieves in Suffolk who called every sort of plunder of the revenue, hiding. So when the First Consul marches 40,000 men into Switzerland, he calls it settling their affairs. When he invaded Egypt, in breach of treaty with the Porte, he called it chastising the rebellious Pashas. If any oppose his measures they are called disturbers of the peace, but his soldiers and partisans are all supporters of order. The Romans too had something of this language—Ubi solitudinem faciunt pacem appellant. We are a little cured of the mania in this country, which was only an octave higher, when we were told that those who advised the war were men delighting in blood, while those who opposed them were lovers of peace. Not being in an official situation, I am not sufficiently informed to advise particularly; but on such a question, I think we should weigh well in what situation we shall be when the war shall come upon us, for come it will, and sooner than I wish to say. I think it would be the wiser way to anticipate the blow, but this is more than is necessary for me to enter into, as that is for ministers to determine. We should not, moreover, let out of our hands any of the means which accident or precaution has left in them for another war. I admit this may lead to a war, but taking into consideration our hope of advantage, from war's delay, and the chance of our being in a worse situation by its speedy commencement, I have no hesitation to declare for the latter, and that so little chance is there of the peace improving our situation, we are not authorised to purchase delay upon such terms. Now, one of these terms has been alluded to, namely, co-operation upon the continent; a hope, whimsical enough, when it is allowed, that the treaty of Amiens is allowed to be a renunciation of the continent. But if it be a little unreasonable to hold this language, and to entertain these hopes, it is surely still more unreasonable to say, 'formerly we interfered for your advantage, and struck the first blow, when we were farthest from the danger; now, when the danger is close at hand to us, do you begin first.' If we are waiting for a co-operation on such terms, it will never happen. We should begin and set the example. Had we done so, we should now see in Europe a vigour and energy that do not now exist. The Italian Republic would not have been erected. Piedmont would not have been annexed to France, nor would Switzerland have been over-run. None of these could have happened, not even the settling of the indemnities, as it is called, or, properly speaking, the partitioning and dividing Germany among the partisans of France, in furtherance of her ambition, and the destruction of the German Empire. It might, Sir, also have had its effect even in France; new circumstances might have taken place, a new combination might have arisen in that country, outraged and indignant at last by such rapacious and inordinate ambition. But no power upon the continent will or can be expected to stir till they hear G. Britain declare herself; till they see her in a state fairly and fully to co-operate with them. The hon. gent. while he has been preaching unconditional cowardly submission to France, has been holding up the point of honour; this is a popular tone, which, however, I will take much lower than he does. I could have wished, indeed, his principle had been lower, and his practice higher. Sir, I put the point of honour out of the question very much. I will not push it to a wild, extravagant, chivalrous excess; for national honour, when rightly understood, is, generally speaking, nothing more than national interest. In general there is nothing dishonourable in giving up this thing or that, when it is not disadvantageous to the national interest. But there is another point which seems not to have entered into the hon. gent's contemplation; I mean the point of national safety. Sir, if France is to be suffered to continue this career; if she is to be permitted to extend this system of aggrandizement and encroachment unopposed; if we are to look upon it with apathy, and mark its progress with base and cowardly indifference, what can we expect but that, when she has attained these objects of her ambition upon the continent, she will immediately fall upon and attack us? It is on that ground that I say, retain those things we have still in our possession, as arms in our hands for our defence and protection. Sir, no man is more an advocate than I am in all ordinary and quiet times for the nation's placing a just confidence in its representatives, and in his Majesty's ministers. But circumstances of an extraordinary nature may arise; occasions of an uncommon magnitude may occur, in which the nation should deliver its opinion, not by force, not in the way recommended by the lovers of revolutions, but by the expression of the sentiments of the enlightened part of the community. Such circumstances have arisen, such an occasion presents itself now. Sir, I doubt whether it would be in the power of any administration to save the country from ruin, without the close and strict co-operation of the country itself, founded upon a deep sense of the difficulties by which we are surrounded; a deep conviction of the dangers to which the country is exposed; difficulties and dangers, such as they have never experienced before. Unless the tide turns, unless the current runs the other way, unless the breeze springs up, we cannot expect, by our sweeps, to be carried off the rocks. The country must aid the govt. Do we want arguments?—do we want appeals to any or every class? To the generous—to the liberal—to the patriotic—to the high-minded, we have arguments for all. The interest of posterity, the grand and noble feelings of our natures, all call upon us loudly, imperiously.—I would appeal, Sir, to that party, for which I cannot be suspected of having much affection, I mean the Jacobins. I would appeal to them. Bad as my opinion is of them, I do not suppose them all to be made up and compounded of wicked elements. Many may be led away by inflamed representations, by exaggerated statements, by too highly-coloured pictures, by heated imaginations—many may be led away by their very virtues. To the Jacobins I would appeal, not as lovers of social order, of good govt. of monarchy, but as men of spirit, as lovers of what they call liberty, as men of hot and proud blood—I would ask them if they are content to be put under the yoke, and crushed by France? I would say to them, that France might annihilate our monarchy, our aristocracy, destroy our church—all good events in their estimation; but after she had effected this, what would she do? They would pass under the yoke of men who would treat them exactly in the same way in which they had treated those they had destroyed. I would put it to them, whether it was consistent with their spirit to be made such instruments and engines? I would persuade them that this species of revolution would put us into the hands of France; a state of liberty, which they would not wish to see realised, because it would be a situation, in which they would become nothing. To another class of persons, the inactive and the inert; to those who think only of their own interests; who console themselves with the idea, that trade will last long enough to make their fortunes; to such men, if there be men of that description, I would say, what security have you, that these hopes will be realised? I would ask them, what security they have, that the change will not come on so rapidly as to crush them on a sudden? Sir, we must not argue from any thing that has before happened. We are in the metaphysics of politics, as we were before in the metaphysics of jurisprudence. Formerly, certain points were taken for granted. We knew that there must be gradations; that as the oak was a hundred years in arriving at its maturity, it must be a certain period in going to decay. But this knowledge will be of no use to us under the present circumstances. The evil may overtake us rapidly, suddenly. We must, therefore, be aut Cæsar, aut nullus—we cannot stand still.—If they reduce us to the situation in which Spain is, or even Prussia, if they get us into a state in which we cannot stir, what must we expect will be our fate? To that situation of insult and danger; to that precipice are we rushing with hasty steps. In the wild vagaries of their hatred it is impossible for us to know what they would do should they get us into their power. Do not let us be sure that we should be treated upon the footing of the most favoured nation. Sir, this country has risen to its present state not so much by its soil or its situation as by the energies of its people; but these energies, this vigour, they will not suffer to subsist if they should ever be able to command them. Let us not suppose that they would not crush us if they could ever get us down. What would they care though the island should not be half so productive as it is? they would have satisfied their hatred; they would have sa-tiated their vengeance; they would have crippled our energies, broken our spirit, and reduced our firm and manly bodies to shrunken and shapeless skeletons. To men of the description I have mentioned, I would address such arguments as these. But at all events, I would have the country declare its mind, that we may be prepared whenever that period comes, when the alternative of war shall be deemed better than a continuance of servile submission, and when we shall think it incumbent upon us to change the timidity of the flying hare for the courage and attitude of the indignant lion. Sir, I hope that in such a case we should find the country true to its ancient character. If the people catch at first nothing but an enlightened rational fear, we may hope it will soon be followed by manly spirit; but never can we hope to save the country but by making them sensible of the full extent of the danger. It is with a view to this that I hope ministers will form and shape their own conduct. If they do shew by their measures that they mean to expiate the sins they have committed, I for one shall heartily and openly applaud them. Whether they will raise their minds to such a height—whether they will expand in the trial and burst, I know not; but at least I trust they will do their duty: at least I hope they will not suffer themselves to descend with execration to posterity; that they will not consent to be handed down as the Augustuli who have precipitated the country to its ruin. Sir, there are many points which I have touched but lightly; others that I have not touched at all. But further opportunities will be furnished me for discussing them. It is, indeed, a deep sense of the calamities of our situation, that has induced me to trespass upon your time so long. A deep sense that the country is going down—that it is almost settling in the water—that the power of France is growing fast round us—that we are dying by a complication of disorders, both chronic and acute; by disorders, some of which are less rapid in their operation than others; we may be cut off by a blow at once.—From such an effect, may we be defended by a sacrifice of that system, an abandonment of those principles, upon which his Majesty's ministers have acted; feeling, as they must do, that we have this complication of diseases. Sir, I trust the country will express its feelings, founded upon its reason; it cannot be blind to the danger—it cannot be ignorant of the causes that have produced it. This, Sir, is my advice; it is an admonition which belongs to the situation in which we are; for fatal, indeed, would it have been if the address had been suffered to pass without any such observations being made as those I have found it necessary to submit to you. I could have wished they had come from a person of more weight, for made they must be.—Sir, unless the House see the danger as I see it, unless exertions and sacrifices be made, such as we have never seen before; unless we abandon all those low-minded and ignoble ideas, the country must be inevitably hurried on to its ruin. I recollect, with peculiar force, the last dying quiver, the last words almost that dropped from the great Lord Chatham before he fainted in the House of Lords. I was present at the melancholy scene. His last words (they were coarse and homely, but, coming from such a man, they derived, perhaps, a peculiar vigour even from their coarseness), his last words, when some submission was spoken of—a submission trifling when compared with what we are called upon to make at present,—were, that “sooner than consent to such a mea- "sure, I would pawn the shirt off my back." Sir, that expression, with the weight and authority of such a name, conveys what I feel upon the present crisis."

Mr. Fox—The Rt. Hon. Gent. describes me as having spoken of the power of France as not being formidable, and as having set it down for nothing. Now, I am in the recollection of every gent. in the House, whether I did not distinctly say, that I was as much impressed with its magnitude as any member in the House, or any man in the kingdom. I feel that power as deeply as any human being. I laid it specifically to the charge of the late ministers, that they had done more to aggrandise France, and to produce that power, than all the ministers that ever preceded them. I said that that enormous aggrandisement was a crime for which that Rt. Hon. Gent. and his associates were gravely responsible.

Mr. WINDHAM.—"Sir, I spoke to the tenor of the hon. gent.'s speech.—I did not mean to fix upon any particular expression."

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER. Although they who thought with the hon. gent. that the conclusion of peace was pregnant with the destruction to the country, may now agree with him in the lamentable picture he has drawn of our situation and prospects, yet I cannot believe that views so discouraging to all spirit of enterprise, so inconsistent with all public confidence and private comfort, will meet with the approbation of impartial men in this House, or in the nation. I cannot believe that a comparison of the respective situation of G. Brit. and France, so full of dismay to the inhabitants of this Empire, will be justified by the observations or by the feelings of the country. The R. H. Gent. spoke as if he thought, that ministers in concluding peace would feel that they had sinned to expiate, while on the other hand the hon. gent. opposite (Mr. Fox) expressed a hope, that ministers did not repent of the part they had acted, in bringing the war to a termination. I must state then to you, Sir, and to the House, that I do not appear before you as an apologist for my conduct in that affair. If I am a delinquent, I am a hardened one; for I never reflect upon the share I had in that event without inward satisfaction. The R. H. Gent. said, that if a person who died 14 years ago were to rise from the dead, he would scarcely know the world, on account of the changes it has undergone. I confess that I look back with horror on many of the events of the last ten years, but with a mixture of pride on the conduct which this House, and which the Country have pursued during so eventful a crisis. Yet will the hon. gent. say, that even 14 years since we had no cause to view France with jealousy? But supposing the R. H. Gent.'s alarm of French power to be just, how does he justify the policy of an immediate peace? He surely then has not examined the question with sufficient attention, or he could not have so completely laid out of sight every consideration of prudence. Several gent. have alluded to the naval and military estab. as being excessively and prematurely reduced. Upon a matter in which, by proper inquiry, accurate information might have been obtained, it is surprising that they should have so greatly erred. The fact is, that with regard to our military establishment it is double what it was in the year 1784; at the same period from the conclusion of the treaty. There has been a reduction in the cavalry, but still it is double what it was in the year 1784. As to the navy, in 1786 we had 115 vessels in commission; we have now 207. In 1792, the year preceding the war, we had 18,000 seamen; at present we have 46,000. So much for the reduction of our naval and military estab. It is with the utmost satisfaction, likewise, that I am able to convert into certainty what was stated as conjecture respecting the increase of our commerce, manufactures, and revenue. I am the more gratified in being able to do so, when I collect the gloomy presages on this subject which were held out by those who disapproved of the peace. In the year ending Oct. 1801, the exports of Brit. manufactures amounted to between 23 and 24 millions. In the year ending Oct. 1802, the exports amounted to no less than £27,500,000. During the last year also the amount of the revenue has been unexampled. Many thought that I was too sanguine last year in taking the surplus of the Consolidated Fund at £4,500,000 for the current year, but for two quarters from the 5th April the amount of the surplus has already been upwards of 3 millions. The floating debt of every kind, which was estimated at upwards of 20 millions will, in Jan. next, amount to no more than 14 millions. The principles on which ministers concluded peace were, that our single efforts could be of no avail to repair what was amiss in the state of the Continent, and that therefore our honour being saved, it was wise to spare our resources for occasions when, if peace could not be preserved with safety and with dignity, we might go to war with the co-operation of allies, or be enabled to assist and animate their returning energies. When Austria retired from the contest all wise and impartial men thought that we should likewise give up the conflict, if terms of peace compatible with our honour and interests could be obtained. In such circumstances we did put an end to the war, our honour entire, our constitution preserved, our best interests secured, and if the renewal of the war should, by any aggression or insults on the part of France, be rendered necessary, it would not be renewed on grounds different from those on which its discontinuance had been justified. The right hon. gent. has insinuated a suspicion that the tone which ministers may have assumed in any discussions which the govt. of France has been inconsistent with the dignity of the nation. I assert most positively, that in no one instance has the honour and interests of the country been committed by ministers; and this is all that it would be proper for me to say upon such a subject. I am satisfied that the public opinion is, that the country wishes for peace, but is not afraid of war; that it wishes what is best, but is determined to be prepared for what is worst—it will submit to no base compromise of its rights, and of its dignity, but will not be misled by exaggerated statements of danger, to overlook all considerations of prudence. In this House, and in the Country, there will be no disposition to prostrate the honour of the nation; but I am aware that there is in some individuals a disposition, originating, no doubt, in the most laudable feelings, to rouse the passions, to alarm the fears, to pique the pride of the country, in order to force us back into war, without any adequate motive.

Mr. T. GRENVILLE, rejoiced to hear that the revenue was in so flourishing a state; but to show that the revenue was flourishing was no answer to his R. Hon. Friend, who had shewn that the whole state was exposed to such imminent danger. The R. H. Gent. seemed to consider the observation, that he might have sins to expiate, somewhat differently from what was intended. It was not merely in regard to the conclusion of the treaty, but what had passed since, that he might have sins to expiate. His Hon. Friend on the same bench (Mr. Fox) seemed to consider the makers and approvers of peace upon the same footing; but there was a material distinction. Those who approved did it, perhaps, in the confidence they had in the assertions of ministers with regard to the tone in which the peace was concluded, and their promises to resist all further encroachments of France. Mr. G. read from the address by Ld. Hawkesbury, on the defin. treaty last May, in which the House relies upon his Majesty to prevent any encroachment on the sources of our wealth, greatness, and naval power. He asked how this had been followed up? He could not conceive it would be contended that no encroachment was here in contemplation, except such as immediately affected our naval power, because the sources of our power might be materially affected by other encroachments. Much stress, he observed, had been laid by the noble sec. of state in defending the preliminaries on the tone and temper in which it was concluded. It appeared, however, that the noble lord himself had begun to distrust the temper of France, by recommending, by the address on the defin. treaty, an increased vigilance in regard to the measures of France. But had there been any vigilance or increased vigour in opposing the encroachments? Those then who approved the treaty, relying on the tone and temper in which it had been concluded, or on the increased vigilance to be exercised, to supply what was doubtful in the temper of Buonaparté, might consistently blame the conduct of ministers, by whom they had been deceived. Mr. G. then proceeded to the different encroachments of France since the treaty, the annexation of Piedmont, the conquest of Switzerland, the annexation of Parma, and the letter to the Bavarian republic. He remarked that the remonstrance on the invasion of Switzerland had been attended with no effect. He stated, that according to report five or six ships had been condemned in French ports since the treaty, on grounds that would not bear investigation; particularly he mentioned the Southampton packet. He complained that none of that vigilance recommended in the address on the treaty had been displayed. He asked if any attempts had been made to renew foreign alliances, the want of which was, as alleged, the cause why the war could not be carried on, or the aggrandizement of France on the continent opposed with success. In the debates on the preliminaries and treaty, the noble sec. of state stated, that all hope of foreign alliance was at an end. Was such a declaration an encouragement to foreign princes to form alliances with us? Was our treatment of allies such as induce them to make common cause with us? He stated the instance of the King of Sardinia, and showed how our refusal to co-operate with the Emperor Alex. I. in procuring redress for that monarch, had alienated him from our cause. He likewise censured our conduct to the P. of Orange. He took notice of the feeble tone in which the speech alluded to the state of Europe. Last year, when we were signing the peace, strong language comparatively was spoken; but now it was merely said, that his Majesty could not see the state of Europe with indifference. Repeated encroachments had taken place, and as far as could be judged by the result, any remonstrance presented to the French govt. must have been in that stile of "polite intimation," mentioned in the course of the debate. The noble sec. of state says to night, "that we are to resist the unjust demands of any foreign power;" but as that is confined to ourselves, and to our naval power, there was no reason to imagine that any encroachments of France on the Continent would meet with any resistance. He concluded with repeating, that as the tone and temper of the peace had not corresponded with what had been held out by ministers, and as their promises of watching the farther encroachments of France had not been realized, they did not merit the confidence of those who had approved the peace, far less of those who viewed our present situation with danger.

LORD CASTLEREAGH said, that as by the war we had secured our own essential interests, it became prudent to husband our resources, after it was manifest that by war we could not repair the losses which the Continent had sustained; while by persevering in the war we might still farther expose those powers that might be well affected to our cause. If the relative situation of France was so materially changed as to affect these, it would be necessary to oppose her encroachments; but it did not follow that we were to resist every measure of France on the Continent, when we had no direct interest and no co-operation of other powers. He contended, that even if it were necessary to go to war to resist any new encroachment, it would be of the utmost advantage to be able to carry the country along with it, by shewing that it was a point of necessity not of choice; whereas before the peace it would have been impossible to make the public co-operate with spirit in supporting it. It was said that ministers had not shewn any attention to foreign alliances; but was it not rather to be presumed that ministers would endeavour to form alliances to oppose a barrier to the aggrandisement of France?

SIR H. ST. JOHN MILDMAY wished that the remonstrance on the invasion of Switzerland might be laid before the House, to shew the tone of ministers, who, he seemed to think, had not displayed sufficient vigour.

MR. WHITEHEAD lamented that ministers, particularly, had rather imprudently, he thought, talked too much, as if there were doubts of the permanence of peace, by that means damping enterprise, and keeping the country in suspense. He approved of the peace, and trusted it would be lasting. He saw no new grounds of war. France was in real possession of Piedmont and of Switzerland when the treaty was concluded. He detested her conduct to Switzerland, but did not think it could justify us in breaking the treaty.—By scattering doubts and fear respecting the permanence of peace, all its benefits would be blasted. As to Mr. Windham, he admired his abilities and admired his high spirit in public and private; but on this subject his powers of right reasoning, not his ingenuity, failed him. But, though he made entertaining speeches to the House, he would find it difficult to prove his consistency, in continuing a member of a cabinet which in a preceding negotiation had offered to give up all our foreign conquests, while he had protested against any of them being given up.

The address was voted nem. con.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, 24TH NOVEMBER 1802.

Mr. TRENCH brought up the Report of the address on the King's speech. On the question for the second reading,

Mr. WILBERFORCE said, he was desirous of taking the earliest opportunity of delivering a few observations on the very important subject now before the House, the more especially, as certain sentiments of his had been alluded to by a Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Canning) on the preceding night. The sentiments which he had uttered at the time adverted to, were such as he was ready to avow. The address seemed to him to speak the language which it was proper for the House to hold, for it was not tight to push matters to extremity with regard to continental affairs: there was a propriety in saying, on the part of his Majesty, that we should keep our eyes on the affairs of the continent, and be ready to take such measures as circumstances may require; and that was properly assented to in the address. If any thing gave suspicion to him in this matter, it was an allusion to the standing policy of this country, which, upon a careful and attentive perusal of the matter, and much reflection, he had formed an opinion upon which he was not likely, on a sudden, to abandon. It was this, That that House and this country had been far too forward to engage in war and continental connexions; to enter into engagements, the full extent of which we could not foresee, and many of which had been, to the highest degree, injurious to this country, having wasted much of its blood and treasure, and that without procuring, in return, the least benefit to us. Therefore, if he were to take the speech in the spirit of a special pleader, he should doubt how far the words of it, or the address upon the subject of the policy he alluded to, was right; but, in a general sense, he had no difficulty in expressing his approbation of the sentiments it contained. But it had been said, that he had uttered, on a former occasion, a sentiment purporting that in no circumstances ought this country to form any continental connexion; a sentiment which he never did utter, nor did he believe he ever should utter it, for it was going to an extreme which he never approved; it being his persuasion that almost all good policy lay between extreme points on either side, as most virtue was said to be in a medium; but he had no difficulty in saying, that, under the present circumstances of this country, it would be wise in us to pause before we renewed any continental alliance or connexion: for if the experience of the last ten years had not made us at least diffident upon these projects, it must have been most unhappily thrown away. He hoped, therefore, we should, in the language of the address, keep our eyes on what was going forward. It was indeed desirable that we should prevent France by land, as well as by sea, from extending her power; but then we were to look to expediency, and not depend on any speculations of statesmen. Need he say any thing on the shortsightedness of men? How had the greatest and the wisest of men been deceived in their conjectures! how had their speculations been turned into foolishness! Indeed some of the most profound politicians had overlooked things which men of the plainest, and almost meanest capacities had foreseen. And here he was led to remember and reflect on a very splendid and eloquent speech which his Noble Friend (Lord Hawkesbury) made in that House, and which could not be too much admired, as it gave earnest of those great talents which had since been exercised in the service of his country, and which had been so great an ornament as well as guide to the debates of that House. He could not help, however, reflecting on the miscarriages which may attend the schemes of all those who are accustomed to a great chain of political combinations in their thoughts and sentiments. The speech of his Noble Friend, although he most unaffectedly admired the knowledge it displayed, as well as brilliancy, on the occasion to which he alluded, naturally occurred to him, when he was considering of human foresight, especially on the events likely to arise out of the policy of states. The truth of the matter was this: politicians calculated on the continuance of the operation of certain causes, and a given number of events; when one of these events happened to be altered, the whole combination was at an end, and with it, of course, all the reasoning that was built upon such combination; nay, the whole system built upon such a combination might be reversed by one event. The whole state of a great number of things might be altered by a single event: so that after a great deal of speculation and political sagacity, we had discovered that all the trouble we had taken, might have been very well spared, and the country have saved vast quantities of blood and treasure. The cost might have been well employed in the improvement, instead of the destruction of mankind. He illustrated this by adverting to the circumstances at the peace of Utrecht, of which the danger, at one time so much apprehended, shifted at once, by a single accident, and changed the whole complexion of political affairs, as they regarded the House of Austria, Spain, and France; and which, from threatening all Europe with the horrors of war, produced a peace for thirty years, in which we were united with France for five years. Whether any policy might again unite us, he could not say, but that was not impossible. Upon these topics there was abundant matter for discussion, to shew how little human calculation was to be depended upon in the affairs of states, and how much was the mere effect of accident, that is to say, upon events which human foresight could not penetrate. These were considerations which ought to make us cautious in relying on the advantages of continental connexions, which might depend on a combination of numerous events. It had been said of him, that he had uttered a sentiment which had about it perhaps some unreasonable merriment, nor was it totally without its sober sadness. The phrase that conveyed the sentiment he alluded to was this: "That the people of this country are too honest to have much to do with continental connexions." His Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Canning), who had inadvertently on that expression, ought to have made some allowance for his situation. He had occasion to go home to his constituents, and to address them on the subject of their pressure, for such must be the effect of every war to such a class as his constituents, and particularly in the last war. He therefore ought to have some indulgence in speaking as the representative of such a class of persons as his constituents were. It was not unreasonable to say that we wanted to recruit our strength, which was much wasted both in blood and treasure; and therefore, if he made use of an odd expression, it was not matter of great blame. But the truth of the matter was this: he had no apology to make for the expression which had been so quoted and animadverted upon, and he was so far from making any apology for the assertion, that he was now about to repeat and affirm it; and it was a sentence to which he called the attention of the House, and particularly that of his Majesty's Ministers. He said again, that the people of this country are too honest to have much to do with continental connexions. He said this because we are always faithful to our engagements, THEY almost always faithless to us; at least always so when it appears to them to suit their interests; for it was part of the general system of the policy of the continent to pay no attention to political engagements when it is in the least degree convenient to neglect them. Of the truth of this there were many instances; a striking one was that of the Pragmatic Sanction, in which, in the course of a few years, every power engaged in it deserted its engagement, England alone excepted. As to the last three we had had with France, to use the strong language of another person, the ink which recorded these engagements was hardly dry when they meditated a breach of them. In a word, the principle on the continent seemed to be, that of paying no attention to political engagements for a moment longer than an observance of them was convenient. Seeing this, and feeling the effect of it, he would ask, whether it was too much to say, that the people of England ought to be cautious in the engagements which they enter into? We certainly ought to be cautious in these things, for we must keep our engagements whether they be convenient or not, whatever others may do with theirs. He entreated the House to consider what was likely to be the result of a confederacy with any of the powers which we had already been engaged with. We had been engaged in as powerful a confederacy as ever was formed, and upon a subject as interesting as ever was contemplated by any state; and on the part of some of the confederates, the ties of consanguinity were added to those of general policy; for Austria had family motives in the confederacy. Russia, Prussia, Spain, Sardinia, and indeed every power in Europe had at some time or other belonged to this great confederacy. Did not every one of these powers get out of the confederacy as soon, or, as it were, steal of out it? nor could it be otherwise, while they were acting on views so different, that some of them were more afraid of each other than they were of the enemy they had united to oppose. In 1797, was not the court of Vienna induced to quit us? How did that court behave towards us on that occasion? Did it discover any extraordinary fidelity towards this country? Did they give us a polite intimation upon that occasion of what they were about to do? No such thing. We could not know for many months, what the treaty was between it and France. It was lodged in the breast of the Austrian cabinet; but when it came out, there was no wonder it was so long concealed, for it disclosed the utmost perfidy with regard to us. So with regard to the German indemnities, no regard was paid to any engagements with us. From all this continental policy of faithlessness, we had only to determine to embark no further than we can see our way. He had heard it said, that among the alterations which the French had introduced, that of changing the meaning of words was one; so that now, No may be made to mean Yes, and Yes No. So that when the French say, they will guaranty the integrity of the Turkish empire for all time, they mean, they will give away part to any power they please, upon having an equivalent, and that they will keep the remainder themselves. Such was the nature of the engagements they made with states; yet we must observe ours if we made any. He proceeded to observe on the probable effect of the new confederacy, and expressed an apprehension that it might be dissolved, as far as regarded Austria or Russia, by the granting, by France, for an equivalent of course, to either, but particularly to Russia, a certain part of Turkey; but by giving part to the one, and part to the other, both might become hostile to us—We had seen that once already, in the course of the last war—nor was a project like this unlikely to enter the head of a Russian statesman—nor was it unlikely that the parties should act upon it. What then should we do? Take care not to form any engagement, unless for present action; not to form any connexion that was to be of distant execution by powers, the good faith of whom we had reason to be diffident of; not to enter into a combination we have reason to apprehend may be dissolved without any regard to our interests, and that we had reason to be diffident of. He called on the House to infer from the experience of the last 14 years of continental affairs in particular. He then proceeded to take a view of the policy which it was the real interest of this country to pursue, and differed totally from the sentiments which had been expressed by Mr. Windham upon that subject.—The Right Hon. Gentleman had declared that, upon a full view of our situation, war appeared to him to be the better course of the two. Now he would ask what we could expect from war?—In the last war we had taken all that was takeable, if he might be allowed the expression. And what could we do but take again what we had agreed to give up? And what should we be the better if another peace was agreed to within 50 miles of Vienna, or at the capital? What could we get by prolonging the war? What could we hope more than to be put into the situation in which we were at the conclusion of the peace? Were the people of this country so ready to burst with prosperity as to be eager for war? Or did it appear, on a calm view of our situation, that a war was necessary for us at this moment? He apprehended not, and he could not help thinking, that there it not for some invincible prejudice of Mr. Windham, a man of his enlarged understanding could not see political events and affairs in the light he did. Before we were engaged again in war, we should look at our revenue, and see that it be improved; we should look the whole of our situation in the face—look at and provide against all our dangers; attend to the dearest interest of our country; but we should consider wherein that interest consists. Let us remember, that, dear as are army and navy, our revenue, our trade, and our commerce, and all our resources, that yet above all our army, above all our navy—that was to say, above all our soldiers—ay, and above all our sailors too—above all our commerce, and above all our wealth, and the preparation which that wealth enabled us to make, there was one more important than all the rest to a free country, and that was the disposition of the people, that was, that its government should possess the hearts of the people; but he begged leave to warn Ministers against the possible event of creating a clamour for war, by exciting the resentment of the people against some detestable acts of tyranny in another power, and of taking advantage of it, to involve the country in war; the effects of which, when the people began to reflect, would be dismal. He entreated that they would, as far as possible, inform the people of their situation; give a right feeling of their danger; observing, that if they hurried on the people to war, without this caution, they would deserve the severest censure, and, he had almost said, the execration of their countrymen. He thought that Ministers acted on the true policy of this country, by endeavouring to restore to it the blessings of peace. He hoped they would turn their thoughts to all species of internal improvements, to the economy, to reformation

of abuses, to the improvement of the education of youth, as the best way to improve morals, to the redress of all species of grievances, as the best way to continue the attachment of the whole people to that constitution and state of things, that rendered us at once the admiration of the whole world, and marked us out as a people enjoying the greatest blessing it had yet pleased Providence to bestow on mankind—a Government, under which liberty was enjoyed, and property protected, and all the comforts of human life better secured, than any other age or country had yet felt. With all these blessings, and with all this power to preserve them and sense to enjoy them, he could not help wishing that we might try the advantages of peace, and avail ourselves of them, and shun all indefinite continental connexions; above all, to enter into no engagements hastily or precipitately, on the ground of any supposed readiness in the public for hostility, on account of some recent instances of flagrant injustice. He wished rather to obtain the sentiments of the middle class of society, who, generally speaking, were the best informed, and who had and who felt an immediate and direct identity of interest with the public at large—a class of men whose opinion, although never neglected in this country, had not perhaps all the weight it deserved. He concluded with observing, that if this course was taken by Government, we should have nothing to fear from the enormous size of the French republic. What if they were 50 millions of men—did that constitute the strength of the Chief Consul of France? Rather his weakness, if left to themselves; for multitudes of them must hate the system by which they are become subject to their present yoke. —Time, therefore, would remove all apprehension in this respect. It was natural to expect, that if this unwieldy mass was left to itself, it would, in time, change its condition—it could not be otherwise; for moral causes were certain of their effects, whereas the effect of human policy was always uncertain. The way to produce the dissolution of this mighty power, was to leave it to its own course; the way to unite it, was to attack it by hostile force.

Gen. GASCOYNE.—He apprehended there might be some mistake in the representation given of our common prosperity. That description did not apply to the most important branch of all, he meant the West India islands. Since the conclusion of peace, a pressure had fallen with great severity on the carrying trade particularly, which diminished it at this time one third of its former value.

Mr. ELIOT said, he should not consume the time of the House by an apology for presuming to ask its indulgence. He had been so little in the habit of public discussion, and felt so un-informed, and, he was conscious, too well founded, a reluctance, to engage in it, that he trusted the House would do him the justice to believe him sincere in declaring, that nothing could have induced him to trespass on its patience, short of the circumstances of the alarming crisis in which it was assembled—a crisis which filled him with considerations, that, he acknowledged, almost superseded and overwhelmed the ordinary emotions of personal embarrassment. All other feelings seemed to fade and die away before those great and primary interests, which must, at the present conjuncture, have seized and fastened themselves on the minds and apprehensions of all men. It was not whether one spoke with a little more or a little less reputation: that was not in the class of reflections which occurred at such a period. It was, whether our nearest and dearest concerns were not at stake. It was for the landed interest to consider, whether the security of their inheritance was not shaken; it was for those engaged in commercial life to consider, whether they were likely long to remain in the safe enjoyment of the well-earned fruits of their industry. The stoutest and boldest hearts around him could not look at the present awful state of public affairs without harbouring a doubt, whether that whole system of relations called our country was not on the very edge of irretrievable ruin. With these impressions, he could not reconcile it to himself to depart from this second discussion [debate on the Report] in perfect silence. If ever there was a period which called for discussion, if ever there was a conjuncture which demanded the deliberative voice of every man endued with a public trust, surely it was the present. In that hour of peril it behoved us to sift our situation to the bottom, to endeavour to trace to its source the danger to which we stood exposed, to examine whether it proceeded from a fundamental error in our system, or from erroneous measures accompanying that system, or from causes independent of both. It was our bounden duty to unveil the danger, not only to ourselves, but to the country, to shew it in its nature and quality, and in its full extent, that we might apportion our efforts to the exigencies which required them, that we might turn from us the danger, if human prudence could avert it, or that, if we should be obliged to meet it, we might encounter it with the firmness that became us; and above all, that we might prove to the enemy (if enemy we had) and to the world, that we were still in the unimpaired possession of that true, genuine, and tried resource of the empire, that persevering constancy, that unshaken resolution, and that cool and determined courage, which had ever distinguished the British people, when summoned to assert the honour, the character, the safety, and the independence of their country. With this view of his duty he should take the liberty of adverting to the events that had occurred on the continent since the close of the last Parliament. Within that short space of time, a period of only a few months, we had been taught a very awful and impressive lesson; we had learnt that France could conquer in peace as well as in war; states and a whole empire had fallen before her. A new revolution had been accomplished on the continent of Europe, which he protested he could not help regarding as little less affecting to the interests of this country than an internal convulsion would have been—he meant the dissolution of the Germanic Body, the circumstances and importance of which had been so ably described by his Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Grenville) on the preceding night, that it would be superfluous, if not presumptuous, for him to dwell on them. In truth, no person who had cast his eye on the map of Europe, or who was conversant with history, or who had heard of the equilibrium of power, could be ignorant that the German empire was the very balance of the scale. The political evil of this transaction was not the only calamity arising from it. It was impossible for us to turn our eyes from the moral mischief of it. No man could behold the overthrow of property, titles, and honours; the abolition of archbishoprics, bishoprics, and corporations both ecclesiastical and civil; no man could see sovereign princes transferred from one dominion to another, and subjects severed from their legitimate rulers, without feeling that all those opinions, habits, prejudices, and principles, which constitute the foundation of civil government and social order, were shaken to their base. All this too had been done under the auspices and influence of a power, which, it was ever to be remembered, was itself founded on the recognition of the violation of property. The political effect of this stupendous change was obvious: it gave to France that ascendancy in the German empire which Austria before possessed. The transaction was marked too by the peculiar contempt and neglect with which his Britannic Majesty had been treated. The arrangement had been made without previous communication, either with the House of Austria, the legitimate head of the Empire, or his Britannic Majesty (the first instance, he believed, in the history of modern Europe, in which so important a change on the continent could have happened without a prior concert of the court of London), who was the ally of Austria, who had recently signed a treaty of peace with France, who was a member of the Germanic Body, and who was peculiarly fitted to be an arbitrator in the partition, as he was entirely disinterested in the question of the indemnifications. It was settled by France, in conjunction with Russia, which had a very slight interest in the Empire, and with Prussia, which expected indemnification in the vicinity of his Majesty's Hanoverian possessions, and the troops of which had not long before, without any declaration of hostility, actually occupied Hanover; and the partition had terminated in establishing a Prussian garrison (in Hildesheim) in the heart of his Majesty's patrimonial territory, and with the additional contumely of extorting from his Majesty a part of the indemnification for the House of Orange. It would be recollected, that, after the private convention at Amiens, between the Dutch and the French ministers, it was stated in a sort of extra-official turn of debate, that the indemnification to the Stadtholder might fall upon this country. It had now actually come to pass, that a part of his indemnification had been derived from his Majesty's continental dominions, and, perhaps, another portion might subsequently be drawn from Great Britain. It had been said in the course of the discussion of last night, that the honour of the country had been saved in the terms of the peace; but he appealed to any man who should review the whole of the transaction of the indemnification of the House of Orange, whether he could lay his hand on his heart, and declare that the honour of the nation had been preserved.—He mentioned Piedmont only, because it afforded an example of the systematic advancement of French aggrandizement. During the negotiation of peace, it had been denominated a 27th military division of France; since the conclusion of the peace, it had been, by a sort of regular progression, formally annexed to the territory of France. The fate of Switzerland was too well known. It had been rumoured, that the British government had made a representation on its behalf. From what fell last night from the Noble Lord (Hawkesbury), and the Right Hon. Gentleman opposite to him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), he rather understood them to have admitted discussions to have taken place on that subject, but that nothing had been done which had committed the honour of this country. Whether or not the honour of the country had been committed, he must observe, was rather a matter of opinion than of declaration. He, however, conceived his Noble Friend (Lord Castlereagh), who had spoken afterwards, to have said, that there had been no remonstrance. In short, the matter was involved in a mystery, which he should not attempt to develope. In argument, he should take it both ways. First, he would assume, that his Majesty's Ministers had interfered. That they had a right, and that they were warranted by every principle of justice and policy to interfere, he had no hesitation in asserting. A more foul, flagrant, and unprovoked aggression on the rights and liberties of a brave, innocent, and injured people, than the conduct of France towards the Swiss exhibited, he believed the records of tyranny did not furnish. But though he applauded the motive, he must condemn the mode of the interposition. It ought to have been made earlier; for, unless he had a distinct and specific assurance from Ministers to the contrary, he could not be convinced that the Swiss, so soon as they had determined to resist the encroachments of France, would have been so negligent of the interests of their cause, as not immediately to have communicated their intentions to the independent powers of Europe, and to the court of London among the first. In that case Ministers must have been apprized of the rising spirit in Switzerland many months ago: they should therefore have adopted means for giving authority to their representation by a suitable armament; and they should have endeavoured to have procured a co-operation on the continent. Instead of precautions of that nature, however, they permitted Germany to be so enfeebled as to have no hope of co-operation from that quarter; and then they came forward with a remonstrance, without even the countenance and support of an adequate armament. The principal feature in the importance of Switzerland to Europe, consisted in its being a barrier to Germany; but we suffered Germany to be partitioned, and then we interposed for Switzerland. We first permitted the house to be plundered, and then we made an inefficient bluster at the door. If, as he had apprehended his Noble Friend (Lord Castlereagh) to have stated, no remonstrance had been made in favour of Switzerland, he must still impute blame to Ministers. There ought to have been a remonstrance, and a remonstrance made in a manner to have given it effect, and not in a way which was calculated at once to commit the dignity of the country, and to aggravate the misfortunes of the people whom it was our object to succour. If there had been no representation, it was because we were unprepared with a suitable armament to support it. But how came we to be so unprepared? Was it possible that his Majesty's Ministers could have put the last hand to the treaty of Amiens without having endeavoured to acquire a knowledge of the actual relation of France with regard to other powers, as well as to ascertain her ulterior views; for instance, to ascertain whether Germany was to have been free in the arrangement of the indemnifications? If no measures had been employed to obtain some information and security on these points, we were at that moment in complete ignorance in respect to even the extent of the possessions of France. Mexico and Peru, for any thing we knew, might have been ceded to her in addition to Louisiana. But admitting that Ministers had been guilty of so flagrant an omission, they could not have been insensible to that spirit of aggrandizement, by which France had been actuated during the whole course of the negotiation of peace; and they therefore should not have been unprovided with the means of meeting it in the event of the measures of the French government subsequent to the peace proving to be such as should menace the interests of this country. There had been nothing new in the system of France. Her power had, to be sure, increased with an accumulated rapidity; but the spirit of her proceedings was unchanged. It had been manifested during the negotiation in multiplied acts of fraud, insult, and violence. Had the seizure of one of the most flourishing portions of Italy, while our ambassador was waiting the pleasure of the First Consul at Amiens, escaped the memory of Ministers? Did they not remember how they had been imposed upon in respect to the limits of Portuguese Guiana? how they had been cheated in the instance of Louisiana? how they had been deceived about Elba? Could they have forgot the trick practised on the Turkish minister at Paris, and the diplomatic manœuvre, which the Noble Secretary of State himself had experienced, in regard to that article of the preliminaries which related to the evacuation of Egypt? He trusted, that neither the Ministers, nor the Parliament, could suffer to be erased from their recollection that memorable interval, during which this country had been held up to the scorn and derision of Europe. He was persuaded that most of the members of the late Parliament, who had voted for the peace, had considered it in a great degree as an experiment; and he was convinced that none of them (at least he meant with very few exceptions) would have given it their sanction, if it could have entered into their contemplation that his Majesty's Ministers would have immediately begun to deport themselves as if the trial had been made, and the result had been successful; if, for example, they could have imagined that our establishments would have been diminished, before it could have been ascertained whether the conduct of France was likely to be such as might afford a rational hope of repose for Europe, and before she had evinced any disposition to reduce the scale of her own establishments. It was his firm belief, that no man in that House (always excepting a very few of very eccentric opinions) would have conferred his approbation on the treaty, could he have foreseen that such a system of measures would have followed it. That the fixed, uniform, and rooted purpose of France, was the establishment of universal empire, if other proofs than her conduct were requisite, was evinced by publications which had lately appeared in a French newspaper called the Moniteur. He was well aware, he might be told, that newspapers were not to be considered as authentic documents, that they might be disavowed; but if the newspaper to which he alluded should be disavowed, could any person in the House credit the disavowal? It was notorious that the press in France was in a state of the most abject subjection to the government, and the Moniteur was a paper which bore the title of official. It was therefore highly improbable that any paragraph should be inserted in it, which had not the sanction of the French government; but it was absolutely impossible that a second publication should appear in it without the direct approbation of Consular authority. It was the second he should quote, partly because it contained a concise description of the present situation and views of France, and partly because it was desirable in a transaction between adverse parties, such as the treaty of peace, to discover the sentiments of both parties in respect to it: and the last publication declared the Consular opinion of that instrument. He should read only what was essential to his purpose: "What is the interest of France? It is to have none but good neighbours and sure friends: in the south, the King of Spain, the ally of France, from inclination as well as from interest, and the Italian and Ligurian republics, which enter into her federative system: Switzerland, the Duke of Bavaria, the good Prince of Baden, the King of Prussia, Holland, to the north and east."—"Every thing has returned to its natural state, into that state which on all sides will exhibit the fine territory of France surrounded by friendly people." Such friendly people, continued Mr. E. as were contained in the new states, which had been created by the late partition of Germany, and which, being in complete subservience to France, were so many forts and garrisons on her frontier, answering the purpose either of aggression or defence. The paragraph then proceeded to state, "That situation is the result of ten years triumphs, of hazards, of labours, and immense sacrifices." Europe, he said, seemed to be described by the Chief Consul as a fine estate, with eligible appendages and circumstances: and what were the titles, what the deeds of conveyance to that estate? "The peace of Lunéville, the preliminaries of London, and the peace of Amiens, far from having changed it, have consolidated it." Here we had the testimony of Consular authority, that when the Noble Secretary of State signed the preliminaries of London, and when his Majesty's Ministers concuded the treaty of Amiens, they had established and consolidated the domination of France; and so he solemnly protested he believed they had. He then proceeded to touch on the topics of consolation which had been offered. Of consolation, he said, he stood so much in need, that he should catch with avidity at any ray of it that might be shewn to him: one was, the extinction of the danger of Jacobinism. It had been alleged, that Jacobinism was suppressed in France; and he did, indeed, believe that no one dare utter a seditious sentence, or write a seditious paragraph against the government there; but with the determined malignity which the Prime Consul bore to this nation, he saw nothing which justified him in flattering himself that Buonaparté would neglect to avail himself of any seditious combinations which might exist either in England or Ireland, for the subversion of the British empire; and it must be admitted, that the intercourse of peace was calculated to mature a system of organization with greater facility than it could have been carried on in war. He really knew not from what source Gentlemen derived their security on this head; not, he imagined, from the band of Irish traitors who were now at

Paris, nor from the illustrious instance of Napper Tandy, whose name he could not mention without remarking, that, had he been vested with the power, he would have pardoned him. He was, to be sure, a traitor, and had been convicted on the clearest evidence; but he was an old man, and perfectly insignificant: he was, in truth, an extinguished traitor; and though he, perhaps, could not justify the feeling, he must repeat, he would certainly have spared his life. But he must add, that if, after his pardon, it had been even whispered or insinuated that the French government had expressed a solicitude for his release, he would have taken care that he should not have been permitted to retire to France; and if he had been suffered to go thither under such circumstances, he could not help saying it was a positive insult on the right feeling of every English and every Irish heart. Before he quitted this part of the subject, he could not forbear reminding the House of the new English paper which had been lately established in Paris, with the cognizance and sanction of the government (for no paper could otherwise be circulated there), and in which, among a mass of very dull sedition, it had, he was informed, been insinuated, that the Irish nation was absolved from its allegiance to the King. This, it must be confessed, was pretty ardent language for this anti-jacobin, pretty stout doctrine for this confirmed friend and potent protector of civil government, who had the press of France at his devotion, to suffer to be circulated in his own dominions, and to be transmitted to the country with which he had recently concluded a treaty of peace and amity. Another topic of comfort was the increase of the trade and resources of the country. He felt it his duty here to correct a misconception of his Noble Friend (Lord Castlereagh), who appeared to have understood some of the Gentlemen near him to have stated in the last Parliament, that the resources of the country depended upon war. His Noble Friend had certainly misunderstood those Gentlemen: they, to the best of his recollection, had said, that it was probable that, for the first two or three years of peace, the amount of our trade would remain much the same (perhaps a little more, or a little less) as it had been in the course of the war; but that when the peace should assume a settled and permanent appearance, it must be expected that the other maritime powers of Europe would resume their share of the commerce, which, during the war, had been entirely engrossed by Great Britain. The Right Hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had represented the exports of the last year (to Oct. 1802) to exceed those of any of the years of war. He was far from meaning to controvert the fact. He had no doubt that the exports of our manufactures to France were very considerable, notwithstanding the severe restrictions of the French government; but it was to be observed, that our commodities being excluded by the French decrees from the whole line of the French coast, our trade was carried on totally on the principle of a contraband traffic, and much of it in neutral bottoms: consequently the prosperity of our navigation was made a subordinate consideration to the manufacturing interest. The price of shipping had, he understood, already experienced a considerable fall; and thus, while continental connexions, one great means of control over the ambition of France, were regarded as impracticable, and by one Gentleman (Mr. Wilberforce) ineligible, even if they could be obtained, we were embarking in a system of commerce eminently prejudicial to that maritime superiority which was our only remaining shield against French aggrandizement. We also ought not to veil from ourselves the immense commercial means of France, if she should apply herself to objects of that nature. It seemed impossible to look without some apprehension at the vast territorial extent of that country, its immense population, and its inexhaustible riches of production, together with the addition of the industry and manufactures of the Austrian Netherlands, and the collieries, iron-works, naval stores, and other multiplied resources of the country lying between the Meuse and the Rhine. Much reliance had been, perhaps, justly placed on the superiority of British capital, credit, and confidence; but he did not think we sufficiently appreciated the force of the capital of French power and of French energy. He was at a loss to discern the principle on which those persons reasoned, who thought that the activity and enterprise which had rendered France so formidable in war, would not have the same overwhelming influence when directed to the concerns of commerce. Of the magnificence of the public works in France, we had a recent example in the military road through the Valais, which he understood was carried on upon the grandest scale. If with the same spirit, and on the same scale, she should turn her attention to the formation of canals, which, he believed, she did not wholly neglect, she must, in consequence of her possession of all the principal rivers of Europe, secure to herself the entire inland navigation of the continent. Of the coast of Europe she was already mistress; and we had too good reason to know that she now had large and valuable colonial territories. He was anxious, however, not to be understood as depreciating the resources and riches of this country; he firmly believed it was almost bursting with opulence. But some Gentlemen argued as if the efficacy of wealth did not consist in its application. They really spoke as if it contained some principle of vitality, as if it had some inherent principle of activity, as if it had ears and eyes, and hands and feet. They say, "We have a surplus of near four millions of money." I say, "The French have four hundred thousand bayonets." I tell them,

"An armed robber is at the door!"—"Oh! but," say they, "we are very rich." In common sense the answer is, "So much the better for the robber." The report which Ministers had to make to Parliament, of their administration, was this: "It is very true that Germany has been so divided as to secure the preponderance of France in the Empire; that a great portion of Italy belongs to France, and the whole of it is under her influence; that Piedmont is annexed to France; that Switzerland has been overwhelmed by France; that the Austrian Netherlands and a considerable part of Germany are united to France; and that Holland, Spain, Portugal, and the coast of Barbary, are in vassalage to her; that we have recognised a principle of armament for France, by permitting her to send fleets and armies to St. Domingo for the subjugation of the negroes; and that, if those fleets and armies fail to subdue the negroes, they are ready to be applied to the invasion of our own colonies; that we have restored to France, Martinico, improved both in point of cultivation and strength, and also Tobago and St. Lucie; and that we have ceded Elba and Minorca. The Cape, we trust, is not yet transferred; but our possession of it depends on a race of ships. Malta we still hold, because fortunately the machinery of the arrangement for our dereliction of it is so curiously complicated, that even its inventors cannot work it. France has imported maritime stores with great activity, and to an immense amount. We have transferred to France near thirty thousand seamen, and we have reduced our own establishment in a greater proportion. All these things are very true; but we have a surplus of near four millions of money." What an account was this for a government to render at such a crisis! Former Parliaments would have demanded, and he hoped the present Parliament would ask, "Where is our army for the protection of the few possessions you have left us? Is Ireland in a state of safety? Where is our Channel fleet, the bulwark of our coasts? Your savings have been made out of the very vital security of the country." No man, he said, could exult more in the flourishing state of the revenue and resources of the nation than he did. But he could not help reminding Gentlemen, that our wealth may be our glory or our shame. If wealth was in its due place, and was made subservient to the honour, dignity, independence, and security of the country, he trusted that, under the blessing of Providence, it might become the foundation of a towering and durable greatness; but if we betrayed more fear for the loss of it than zeal in defending it, if we did not direct it to its proper objects, it would be no longer the magazine of our strength, or the storehouse of our power, but an additional bait to the rapacity of our foe. In respect to the necessity or expediency of war at the present moment, he should not presume to deliver an opinion. It was a point on which those were responsible who had the necessary information. But he was prepared to say, that we ought to arm without delay, and that we ought to retain, even at the hazard of war, those points of cession which remained in our hands, as some balance (though he confessed a very inadequate one) to the accession of power which France had acquired since the signature of the treaty of peace. An Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wilberforce) had asked; "Why should you risk hostilities? What would be the chances of war?" He should reply by asking, What had been the chances of peace? We beheld France possessed of large territories in the western hemisphere, something in Asia, much in Africa, almost the whole of Europe, and a long line of coast opposite our shores, augmenting instead of reducing her establishments both by sea and land; shewing no disposition to forego her system of aggrandizement, but, on the contrary, pursuing it with unabating zeal and increased rapidity; prohibiting our trade, and manifesting a rooted desire for the destruction of that country which presented the only remaining obstacle to her universal dominion. If in this predicament we submitted, she would continue her encroachments, and the point of our resistance must at last arrive, when we should have diminished means of contending with her. It was evident we must, under the present aspect of affairs, arm to the amount of a war establishment; and under such circumstances, what would become of the economy of peace, which was the benefit most expected and most desired from it? He begged nevertheless to be understood as far from advising that the country should be rashly plunged into war. Perhaps that event might be still averted by a firm, dignified, and vigorous remonstrance; but whether such a representation might have its due weight and effect, when urged by those who had hitherto spoken only in the tone of acquiescence and submission, was, indeed, a matter of very grave and serious reflection. He should trouble the House no farther than to observe, that if unfortunately we should be compelled to a renewal of hostilities, it would not be a contest for our honour, though that would be a legitimate cause for war; nor for the rights and the independence of other nations, though that also would be a legitimate cause of war; but it would be a struggle for the very existence of the empire; and relying on the justice of our cause, and on that most valuable of all our resources (which, he trusted, we should ever most carefully cherish and foster), the generous spirit and magnanimous fortitude of the people, he hoped we might look with confidence to a favourable result.

Sir F. BURDETT agreed in many points urged by those in whose opinions he had often concurred; and also in many that were advanced by Gentlemen with whom he never before had the good fortune to concur in opinion. As to the speech of the Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Eliot) who had just sat down, if it did not provoke and incite to war, it appeared to him the most strange and disinterested exertion which he had ever witnessed. Indeed that Hon. Gentleman has depicted, with great truth, the melancholy state of the country, arising out of the gigantic aggrandizement and accumulating resources of France. Without pretending to any great degree of political penetration and sagacity, it was doubtless easy to foresee that that aggrandizement, seconded by all its concomitant circumstances, must be a source of alarm and of danger to Great Britain. So formidable a situation could not be contemplated by an Englishman without regret or dismay, and no man could be more deeply struck and alarmed at it than he was.—But an Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Eliot) says that he voted for peace as an experiment. Surely the changes and chances that may arise from war or peace are not of a nature to be trifled with, and the hazarding of such experiments cannot be said to argue any great wisdom or prudence. He was led much more to adopt the sentiments of another Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wilberforce); sentiments, however, which he could not but hear with surprise from a person who had been a zealous and uniform supporter of the war, but which certainly, as far as his judgment went, laid down the true policy which this country ought to pursue; for nothing now was so absurd as any attempt to renew or preserve what was called a balance of power in Europe.

Mr. DILLON defended the Irish representation from swelling the Ministerial phalanx, and said, notwithstanding, that the reason they opposed them was, because of the melancholy situation of the country since the conclusion of the peace.

Mr. JOHNSTONE approved of the conduct of Ministers, in endeavouring to maintain peace, and was sorry to see them deserted by their former friends, while they were attacked by Gentlemen of such formidable abilities. Indeed, it was too evident that endeavours were making to remove them from office. The conduct of a Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Windham), and that of his friend, gave him much surprise. For after the Netherlands, and in a great measure Holland, have been abandoned to the French, was it prudent to instigate a war for interests in which we were so remotely concerned, and when our interference could not be attended with any prospect of success? Equally must he disapprove of all attempts to renew continental alliances with Austria, at least till other powers were inclined to co-operate with us. He trusted Ministers would remain calm and moderate, and not expose the country to the chances of war, unless our naval power was attacked, or our colonial possessions were invaded.

LORD TEMPLE.—“We are told the country is not prepared for hostilities, that it is therefore wrong to indulge language which is impotent, unless there be a force to support it. It is said we wish for war, at any rate, in preference to peace on any terms. I rise to contradict that assertion. War is no part of our system. We feel in common with others every danger connected with war; we know the difficulty and almost impossibility of engaging in a war at this time. The object of our arguments is to open the minds of the people to their danger; to shew them into what lands the country has fallen; to shew them how degraded, sunk, and debased; to shew that while the country continues in such hands, there is no hope of success in war, nor of honour and security in peace. They attract danger and disgrace as conductors attract lightning; as blunt conductors, which attract most strongly, and spread the mischief most widely around. The country approved of the peace, on a promise that we should again commence war when France was guilty of any aggression sufficient to provoke hostilities; but the promise has not been kept, though a multitude of aggressions, of the greatest magnitude, have taken place. We were told last night that Ministers act on the same system on which they have acted all along; if so, what right have they to call the country to arm? what reason is there for arming now, that did not before exist against disarming? If they did not interfere for the rescue of Piedmont, the preservation of the independence of Germany, including the dominions of their own sovereign, for what will they interfere now? Much, however, remains yet to be done, and in other hands much may be done, not by engaging in a hazardous war, but by real firmness; not by that happy mixture, as it is called, of conciliation and firmness, the most nauseous mixture that was ever forced down the throat of the country, but by real conciliation and firmness.”

Gen. MAITLAND said, as evidence of the expedition with which the means for an augmentation might at any time be supplied, he need only remind the House of a case that happened in the West Indies. The late Earl Howe had only six ships in a condition to meet the French fleet of much superior force. In this situation, he sent to British vessels at New York, the men of which immediately volunteered their service, and furnished him with more than he wanted to man his fleet. He was sure then that should an increase of our naval force be necessary, we should be able to procure sailors even faster than we should want them. Much had been said of the insufficiency of confidence, credit, and capital, on which we relied for the stability of our commerce, and how little they would avail us whenever Bunaparté should think fit to throw his sword into the scale. Now he thought this very apprehension was the best security for our commerce. Commerce never flourished under tyrannical government. It could only find its way into some free government, without ambition or passion for conquest; for such only could possess that confidence, without which trade cannot flourish. A Right Hon. Gentleman had said, that, weighing all the circumstances of our situation, the tendency of his mind was for war. If war could remedy the evils of which he complained, this advice might be well founded; but it could not. War would not change the situation of France in Europe. We might indeed take her colonies, sweep the ocean of her ships, and, by ruining her trade, destroy her finances; but what would be the result of all this? Why, she would do as she had done before. She would make some neighbouring state her bank, and draw upon it for the reimbursement of her losses.

The SECRETARY at WAR.—“Sir, I am surprised that any Gentleman should say that we have no army, and that we have laid aside our navy. So far is this assertion from being founded in fact, we have a greater efficient force than we ever possessed in peace, or even in several years of the late war. The diminution made in it is only of the corps that were enlisted for a specific time, of the militia, and of a number of the fencible corps that were raised upon the same terms with respect to the duration of their service. Thus our physical force is not only greater than at the periods I have mentioned; but it is in a state of organization and discipline for the purpose of carrying it to such a state of augmentation, as would make it not a very pleasant thing for any foreign force to meddle with it. A Gentleman (Mr. Eliot) has asked, Where is our Channel fleet? We have not, to be sure, thirty or forty sail of the line lying at Spithead, but we have a fleet greater than ever it was in a peace, or even during part of the late war, not stationed in one port, I allow, but scattered over the world; in the West Indies, in the Mediterranean, and several other places, in none of which it is not sufficient to meet any force that France could muster against it in those respective quarters. With the aid of the wise and able administration of the Noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty, and the regulations which he has introduced, a system is formed which would enable us, at any time, to put a force to sea fully adequate for our defence; and therefore there is no cause for dismay, so far as respects our navy. That the situation of France is formidable; that she has attained a power and influence greater than may be compatible with our interests; and that, as such, she should be viewed with considerable anxiety by this country, are points which no man attempts to disguise; but the tendency of their speeches beyond that I did not know. From the speech of a Right Hon. Member (Mr. Windham) yesterday, I thought then that their object was to renew the war; but to-day I find, from the speech of a Noble Lord, that their object is the dismissal of his Majesty's Ministers. It is mainly in the Noble Lord to avow it, thinking, as he does, that himself and his friends could fill their places much better. This, then, being the Noble Lord's opinion, why not bring the question before the House, and put it fairly at issue, instead of drawing a gloomy picture of our affairs, and exaggerating the dangers of the country, with a view to make it discontented with the present Administration? That Administration the Noble Lord was also pleased to describe as a marshy milk and water composition. Whatever may be our deficiencies, it would at least be said of us, that we gave peace to the country, and that it suffered no calamity in our hands.”

Mr. Fox.—“I feel the most sincere pleasure that the Noble Lord has so frankly confessed the views and objects of the Gentlemen with whom he acts. The Noble Lord's sincerity on this occasion has enabled the House to come to some practical conclusion upon the arguments of those connected with him. He declares that his wish is not for war, that the sole end of his solicitude is, that the present Ministers should be dismissed, and that his friends should be appointed in their place. Then his anxiety is for a change of Ministers. For the last two days, during the course of this debate, I have heard nothing but language, in my conception, calculated to provoke war; it appeared to me to have no other practical purpose, but I find I was deceived; for the Noble Lord states that no such thing was in view; the only thing he and his party desired was a change in his Majesty's Ministers. However indifferent I may have felt of late to these changes, I confess I should not be unhappy if the Noble Lord's friends were attached, in some way, to Administration, because then we should probably get rid of their war-like language, and the country would be relieved from that agitation which such language tends to produce. It is rather uncandid, however, in the Noble Lord's friends to call into their aid every popular topic, every subject likely to inflame the popular feelings, when they have nothing in contemplation but their own advancement. If they feel that the present Ministers have misconducted the public affairs, let a fair appeal be made to the public opinion, to the judgment of this House. Every patriot will go impartially to the discussion; but let not charges be thus indirectly advanced. Having had some experience in parliamentary concerns, I think I may offer some advice to the Noble Lord as to the mode of conducting an opposition to Ministers. If they were guilty of such acts as rendered them unworthy to direct the government of the country, I would immediately move an address to his Majesty for their removal; and if their conduct was not such as to demand such a serious proceeding, I would propose a motion suited to the occasion. This would be the fair manner of attacking Ministers, and certainly it would be more congenial to the character of the respectable persons whom the Noble Lord calls his friends, and better calculated to answer his ends, than the practice of blending with an address to his Majesty, such impeachments as the Noble Lord had dealt in. If it is supposed criminal in Ministers to have reduced the naval or military force of the empire, let a motion on that head be submitted to the House; or if the address under consideration be not considered sufficiently strong, or the speech to which it replies not sufficiently explicit, let an amendment be submitted, and a further explanation demanded. Though I am not disposed to join the Noble Lord's friends in their censures of the present Ministers, yet if these Ministers were, as report stated, introduced into office, in order to stand in the way of a great act of justice to the majority of the Irish people, and to a large proportion of the inhabitants of England, most undoubtedly they would deserve censure; but if such is the ground of the Noble Lord's abuse, why not avow it? The mode by which Ministers got into power was certainly mysterious. If it be such as I have already alluded to, the Noble Lord's proposition cannot be ill received, though Ministers may plead the peace they have concluded as a set-off against this charge. I cannot help expressing my surprise at the dreary picture which the Noble Lord and his friends have drawn of the state of this country, compared with that of France, and my regret for the terms in which they are in the habit of speaking of the French people and their government. It is not becoming the dignity or policy of this country to use such language, nor is the comparison consistent with justice. Nothing but the spirit of exaggeration or consummate blindness could imagine it. Even if it were fact, it does not become those who excited Austria, Prussia, and the other powers of the continent, to interfere in the internal legislation of France, and to compel her to submit to a family she abhorred, to dwell upon a situation of affairs which their own infatuation has produced. The Noble Lord would describe the power of Great Britain so much at the mercy of France as to excite universal dismay; and a Right Hon. Friend of his has in very glowing terms enumerated the questions which a man, rising from the dead, would be apt to put respecting the changes which have lately taken place in the state of European powers, with the answers he must receive. I ask, would it not be among his first questions, who were the Ministers of this country all this time? by whom was this extraordinary revolution effected? and how came our commerce to be thus endangered, and our continental alliances dissolved? This inquirer might suppose that this unexpected aggrandizement of France arose from the inertness of the British Government; but what was the fact? that the cabinet of England contrived to provoke the most formidable confederacy against France that the continent had ever witnessed; that it was not from the want of vigorous resources, but from a misapplication of that vigour, that French power was extended; and that while the avowed cause of the war was social order and religion, Valenciennes was taken possession of in the name of the Emperor, and Dunkirk was attacked, in order to be retained for the use of England; but the failure of this powerful coalition was easily to be accounted for: the spirit of liberty then prevailing in France—how far successful in its pursuit, is not now the question for discussion—and the pride of the French people, insulted by the manifesto of the Duke of Brunswick, produced such a degree of resolution and enterprise as was not to be subdued. That impulse, once roused, went on to the termination of the war. A similar spirit enabled the Dutch to attain that situation of eminence which formed an interesting subject of contemplation to the friends of liberty and the admirers of human industry. In the unparalleled progress of that people, no British statesman ever saw any ground for alarm. On the contrary, during the reigns of Charles I. and II. of William and Anne, every politician of this country felt proud of the noble effects which the spirit of liberty produced in Holland. The resistance of the Dutch to the arbitrary measures of Philip II. and their proud contempt of the insulting language of Louis XIV. gave pleasure to all good men; and no one deserving the character of a great man ever expressed any apprehension that the enthusiasm of a nation struggling to be free would be productive of mischief to others, because it was rightly judged that they would soon recover their proper temper—that they would in time find their natural level. The growing greatness of Holland was not therefore an object of terror, but of admiration, to our ancestors; and I know not why the greatness of France, arising from the same source, should now be quoted to damp the spirits and to excite the envy of this country. That nation too will ere long find her natural level; her ambition will soon waste itself, or her strength will decay. At all events, what can Great Britain now achieve to restrain that ambition? Though I do not look at that ambition with the dread which seems to haunt the fancy of other men, I have no hesitation in saying, that I am an enemy to the aggrandizement of France; but I will appeal to common sense, whether, even though an evil be obvious and severe, we should attempt to remove it by an effort which must aggravate its severity? Such, I think, would be the result of the interference which some Gentlemen would recommend to oppose the proceedings of the French government. I should prefer the advice of Machiavel, as repeated by the Learned Gentleman behind me, to wait the operation of time, and there is every reason to calculate that the danger now so apprehended will disappear. From the manner in which the Noble Lord and his friends generally speak of the French government, one would suppose that in their opinion France had, since the peace, been guilty of much aggression against this country. But how did the case stand? Was the arrangement of the German indemnities to be considered as an aggression, an arrangement which was partly settled by the treaty of Luneville? Was it not known at the time the peace of Amiens was ratified, that those indemnities were to be provided for by secularizations? This arrangement, then, is no aggression against Great Britain. If so, why not as well complain of Russia, who interfered as actively in settling these indemnities as France? The House is told that the Elector of Hanover is a loser by this plan; I believe otherwise; but even if he were, it has been the policy of all former reigns, since the accession of the House of Hanover, to keep the concerns of that electorate quite distinct from the affairs of this country; and why not? for we had no more to do with it, than with Hesse Cassel, or any other German principality. But perhaps it is, on this occasion, made a professed object of solicitude, with a view of facilitating an approach to power—with a view of courting his Majesty's confidence. With respect to the fate of Switzerland, I feel as warmly interested as any man. I have had an opportunity of knowing the people of that country. I admired their institutions; I loved their simplicity; among them prevailed that regular and lawful equality which all the friends of true liberty esteem; many such men therefore sought an asylum, and always met a welcome reception among them. For such a nation, who, that feels as a man, would not be solicitous? But still I would ask, can the conduct of France towards that nation be pronounced an aggression against this country? It was admitted that it formed no just ground for war. Therefore it was no aggression. Was not Switzerland known, at the conclusion of the peace of Amiens, to be at the disposal of France? Nay, was not that very circumstance particularly dwelt upon by those who opposed the treaty? Why then call on us now, after peace, to do away what we knew to exist when we ratified that peace? Is it to be maintained that we never are to observe neutrality in the concerns of the continent? that we are always to meddle, however little our prospect of benefiting ourselves or others? How far is this terrible doctrine to be pushed? It is known that Switzerland has been in a state of commotion for some years; that she has been agitated by contending parties; but the French government has interfered to settle their disputes, and perhaps to establish no internal party at all. I sincerely wish the result may be conducive to the rights and happiness of Switzerland; but whatever may be the event, why should we interpose? are we to hold ourselves forth as the guarantes of the independence of all the states of Europe? Are we to imitate the decree of the French Convention of the 19th of Nov. 1792, and proclaim ourselves to Europe as ready to defend the liberty of every nation? It was easy to foresee at the time peace was concluded that the external relations of Switzerland must be subject to the control of France, and it was so argued. Yet it was now contended that France had gained more territory since the peace than she had obtained during the war. But when did she gain it? Where was the acquisition equal to the Netherlands, Savoy, the Cisalpine and Ligurian republics, and the borders of the Rhine? Perhaps the Right Hon. Gentleman who made that assertion thinks the conquest of Switzerland of equal importance; but I am of opinion that the French government will do wiser not to make a conquest of that country; to leave it to itself, and to acquire there the influence of friendship, will, in my mind, be much better policy. Does the Right Hon. Gentleman call Savoy an addition of territory, because, from being the 27th department, it has been lately styled the department of the Po? It is not now surely meant to talk of the losses of the King of Sardinia. We made no stipulations for that monarch in our treaty with France; and Gentlemen rather acted unfairly, in charging Ministers with those things which happened previous to the peace, as offences to be classed with those committed since that period. The same charges ought not to be repeated in both ways. If Ministers were guilty of a crime, in suffering the King of Sardinia to be deprived of his Italian dominions, they had many accomplices. It is well known that France was ready to restore the King of Sardinia, if Austria agreed.—But no; Austria dissented; she protested against his admission into the negotiation: "leave him out," said Austria; "if I accede to his restoration, you may demand some part of Venice; you may reduce the territory I look for; therefore let him take care of himself; he is an independent prince!" Whatever may be thought of these circumstances, they were articles of accusation properly belonging to the discussion of the peace, and were then urged, and should not now be brought forward again. Upon the whole, I think that the Right Hon. Gentleman on the floor (Mr. Windham) has not argued consistently with the object avowed by his Noble Friend this evening. The only conclusion to be drawn from his observations last night was, that he wished for war. But now his Noble Friend, who offered himself as the organ of the genuine sentiments of his connexions, stated, that they conceived war to be impossible for any rational man to meditate at present. Then, in point of prudence and honesty, why make use of such irritating, inflammatory language? One Gentleman regrets, that we have not a Channel fleet in commission, that we should reduce our troops; he certainly too speaks out. According to his judgment, we should not diminish the expense of war, but always proportion our expenditure to that of France, in order, as he says, that we may be prepared for war. If this advice were to be followed, what would become of our finances? and in what state should we be, if actually impelled to engage in hostilities, perhaps in want of money? But a Right Hon. Gentleman seems to consider money as unnecessary to the purposes of his achievements; he relies on the force of bayonets; in his confidence in that spirit of chivalry which originated this war, he (Mr. Windham) despises wealth, and perhaps exclaimed, in the language of the poet:

"In shields, and swords, and arms, my soul delights;

"These are the gems for us, adventurous knights."

Riches may not be fit or desirable for those adventurous knights; but for the defence of a nation I conceive them very necessary to support our fleets and armies; and sometimes we might, as we had heretofore, find money useful in purchasing the assistance of foreign force, a practice not to be condemned, when prudently managed. To its indiscriminate censure, there is a short answer—that we have found its good effects. It is surprising how near extremes are to each other; the Jacobins, when the French revolution commenced, threw their books in the fire; they contemned experience, all old reasoning was exploded; but that reasoning they soon again found it wise to consult. To the deficient experience of history on the theory of man, I would therefore advise those Gentlemen Anti-jacobins to resort, who, frightened by the aspect of France, seem to have lost the use of their reason. A Gentleman says, "Don't surrender Malta, though you have covenanted by treaty to do so." Undoubtedly it is right to retain that island, until the conditions of peace concerning it are complied with, but no longer. We must fulfil our treaty, if nothing objectionable has occurred on the part of France, towards us, since the ratification of it. The principle of peace pledged us to do so, and the national honour calls for it. I deny that the greatness of France can be any apology for doing so, or that its increased power can be made a just ground of war. That power was known and acknowledged at the conclusion of peace; therefore it cannot now be advanced as a pretence for quarrelling.—I can see nothing in the continuance of peace either dangerous or dishonourable, nor do I conceive it less secure than other treaties with the same nation have been. There are but two species of war in which I should be willing to engage: for the one I am not so sanguine as for the other, yet I would not shrink from it when the occasion was pressing and my means were equal to the accomplishment of my object. The war in which I should most readily engage, would be that for the maintenance of our national honour; the other to which I have alluded, would be for the support of a just balance of power on the continent; and, however the latter principle may be reprobated, I am clearly of opinion, from a review of our history from the Revolution to the peace of 1763, every war undertaken upon that principle was justifiable. The case, however, is now quite altered. After the experience of the last war, no man can say that we should place much reliance, or that we ought to risk much for any continental connexion. I should be sorry if Ministers now looked for such a connexion with a view to the renewal of hostilities. The ministers of the French monarchy were charged throughout Europe, with concluding the treaties of Aix la Chapelle, Paris, and Versailles, with the determined and perfidious resolution of renewing hostilities the moment any prospect of success offered. I sincerely hope the present Ministers of this country will preserve themselves from the suspicion of a similar design. I trust they are incapable of it. I must yet observe, that if any man looks too much to aggression as probable, his fear goes a great way to keep up a hostile mind toward the power from which the aggression may be apprehended, and too strongly disposes him to hostility. I trust Ministers are not so absurd as to look to Austria for assistance in any hostile enterprise; that power cannot afford it; besides, if France suspects it, the suspicion must urge her still more to cripple the Austrian government. It is imprudent, therefore, to let out their expectations; even loosely to hint at it, is unkind towards Austria. I really think that Ministers, in their apprehensions, or in yielding to the apprehensions of others, have divulged too much the means they hope to employ on a remote contingency. I am sadly afraid they indulge a rivalry bordering on hatred, and fancy all should join in their alarms, without considering that the fears of many of the states of Europe are as much directed against our ascendancy by sea, as against the extraordinary power of France on the continent; and I have no doubt, were there an assembly in France of the same nature as this House, the formidable power of our navy would be as much the subject of jealous remark and apprehension, as the continental strength of France is now to us. Much has been said of certain publications in a French newspaper, for which the French government ought, according to some Gentlemen, to be made responsible: this is a kind of poetical justice. In the course of the last century, we had in England an imprimatur appointed by Government, who revised and controlled all the publications of our newspapers, and yet no blame was ever attached to our Government by foreign courts, for any of those publications. No such responsibility was ever thought of. It has been complained of, that a paragraph appeared in a paper (the Argus) published at Paris, which states that the Irish owe no allegiance to the British Government; one number of that paper, in which this paragraph was inserted, was shewn to me; it contained much abuse of myself and my friends. Now as I don't feel any pleasure in seeing my friends abused, and none at all in being abused myself, I never sought to see another number of that paper—(a laugh)—but to point out how industriously some newspapers of the two countries try to be even with each other in abuse, a London newspaper was shewn to me in Paris, in which it was stated, “That Great Britain should fight the French government with fleets and armies; and that Frenchmen should fight it, not merely with pens, ink, and paper.” Now I would ask, is not this a direct instigation to assassinate those who manage the government of France?—(A cry of No! no! no! Order! particularly from the Treasury Bench.) I am convinced that a jury would so pronounce it—an invitation to insurrection it obviously is. Such an invitation might, on some occasions, be excusable; but speaking as the representative of a people in amity with the French government, I cannot approve of it. Among the most singular complaints against France, is, that Napoleon Tandy, and other Irish exiles, have found an asylum there. What! was it intended by those who bargained with the unfortunate men, that they should not find a landing-place in any part of the habitable globe? That bargain specified that they should go to some country at peace with our Government. They have done so, and why then should those murmur who made the bargain, which, by the by, according to its conditions, ought to have been fulfilled much sooner than it was? I again say that I am as anxious as any man in this House to preserve the spirit of the country; and the best way to preserve that spirit is not to engage in war without necessity, and to avoid those unmanly libels which, both in and out of Parliament, are too frequently levelled at the French government. Those libels, I know, are much talked of and reprobated in France; though I also know there are many philosophical minds, both in that country and this, who look at this war of words with the utmost contempt, but yet I should prefer it to any other species of warfare. Let the Moniteur and the Morning Post, the Times and the Argus, go on in their hostile language; it is easier to be endured than a war of bayonets. Let us, however, consider, at the very moment we have sent an ambassador to the French government, eminently qualified to maintain that honourable character—when the representative of our Sovereign may be now, perhaps, making his bow, or performing the accustomed ceremonies in the presence of the First Consul of France, is it decent, is it dignified, that the Members of this House should be applying opprobrious epithets to the Chief of the French government? Certainly not. It can answer no purpose, unless it is wished to keep up a spirit of perpetual hostility. This I shall ever deprecate. I think the present a most momentous crisis indeed for this country, but I see no danger from the government or people of France. Those who do, must admit that they cannot avert that danger, or soften the animosity they suppose to exist, by abuse and irritating language. I heartily disapprove of such language, and still more of the expensive establishment which is desired, perhaps to manifest still more strongly the inveterate prejudice which dictates that language. Immediately after the conclusion of peace, the Minister held out a hope that the establishment he then proposed would be still farther reduced; but it seems a different course is to be pursued. This I shall most certainly oppose—not that if I supposed such an extended establishment necessary, I should decline to support it, lest France should take umbrage, for she would have no right to do so; but because I consider a large standing army, independent of considerations of expense, to be the most dangerous instrument of influence in the hands of the Crown. The Noble Lord expresses much dread, that the French, by their industry, will injure our commerce; perhaps he would think the cutting of a canal from Paris to Dieppe, a cause of alarm—perhaps a just ground for war. The attempt is really an alarming proof of French enterprise, and the execution of it would be a still more alarming proof of French industry. If the First Consul should order Genoa to rival London, and Amsterdam to rival Liverpool, as commercial orders are always obeyed, the circumstance would be very alarming; but would war remedy the evil, or would not greater evils arise out of it? For my part, I can admire the beauties of French manufacture without feeling any alarm, or hostile disposition; because, however beautiful they may be, I know the superior value of our own; I know the potteries of Staffordshire can withstand the beauties of French china. To go to war on principles of rivalry, would be an act of madness and folly; to be sure by war we might get rid of our money, but that is not worth the consideration of the Noble Lord's friends. Among the connexions of the Noble Lord may be found the fears of age and the ambition of youth, both urging to a line of conduct which, I hope, this House will resist with as much determination as we should any hostile aggression. If any aggression on our honour and independence should be attempted from any quarter, let Ministers call on this House, and I am confident they will find us and the country unanimously responsive to their call. Let us shew ourselves unwilling to attack, but strong to resist; and if we do go to war, let it be a war of defence. Upon this principle I hope Ministers will act, and they cannot fail to be popular; for I am happy to find, on my return to England, that there is but one sentiment among the people, as to the necessity of persevering in the maintenance of peace. An Hon. General (Cascoigne) competent to speak on the subject of commerce, has stated, that our manufactures are flourishing, but that our commerce has diminished. I believe that description of commerce has diminished, which arises out of a state of war. It was naturally to be expected. Such a diminution has taken place at the conclusion of every war. It was so in 1749, 1763, and 1783. It is, therefore, the common effect of peace; and if that change were to be attended to, it would be an argument for perpetual war. The French are much condemned in this country for the strict prohibitions they have established against the importation of our manufactures. They had a right to do as they pleased in that respect. Surely no man would seriously contend that such a prohibition furnished a just ground for war. We, of all other nations, are least entitled to complain of that kind of prohibition; for no nation took more pains to exclude any foreign manufactures that should interfere with her own than we did; but the conduct of France, in this instance, is founded on an erroneous policy, which must, if long pursued, injure themselves more than us. In Holland and Prussia, on former occasions, our manufactures were prohibited with the utmost strictness, yet no national alarm was excited. We considered then, what it was equally incumbent on us to consider now, that such a species of prohibition was mere matter of internal regulation, not understood to imply any hostile purpose.

Mr. WINDHAM rose, and in a speech ingeniously refined in argument, yet impressively familiar and pointed in its illustrations, offered a powerful answer to all that had been advanced in opposition to his known sentiments from either side of the House. We cannot pretend to report his speech in detail, but must, though with reluctance, content ourselves with touching lightly on its leading positions. He observed, in answer to a sarcastic remark from a former speaker, representing him and his friends to give many proofs of their fears, and few of their judgment; that those very fears might be the genuine progeny of judgment, and, therefore, the best proofs of its existence in those who gave the alarm; that, if the fears were conceived only on the approach, or in the very midst of real danger, not to feel them were the only proof of want of judgment; that on the score of fear, therefore, no accusation could be brought against him and his friends, without due discussion of the whole matter which stood at issue. He regretted his inability to recollect the different reasonings which had been advanced in speeches which a sense of duty compelled him to oppose. His habits of debate had not been such as to give him a command of that ready, flexible, and discriminating recollection, for which the Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fox) was eminently remarkable. But he thought it incumbent on him, on this occasion, to attempt some reply to those things which were the most revolting to his judgment, and which had the most forcibly impressed themselves upon his remembrance. How was it possible for that Hon. Gentleman to deny to the penetration of his own mind, that the seeds of inordinate political aggrandizement were sown in the minds of the French nation, coeval with those of democratical revolution? Every succession of the revolutionary rulers had openly professed the very principles which so conspicuously possessed the mind of the present First Consul. The extension of dominion was made, at one time, the very pride of the revolution; at another, its necessary defence. But still it was in one form or another, for one purpose or another, the most confidently professed. And was it for any man to come into this House, and offer an encomiastic apology for the first efforts of a principle which had been thus carried, of deep design, and by no inevitable necessity, to its present threatening and overpowering height? It had been said, he observed, that Britain had gained nothing by the war, that France had acquired nothing by the peace. Was it, then, nothing gained to preserve our constitution; to hold at bay both the revolutionary principles, and the political ambition of the French; to maintain that erect, independent, national spirit which has so long constituted the very peculiarizing essentiality of the British character? Was it nothing to confine within the limits of Europe an ambition to bestride, as but a petty space, the very world? Buonaparté, with the soul of an Alexander, might regard this many-peopled earth as but a large prison; and was it nothing to confine that restless spirit within a space which might, to its hopes and darings, be but a narrow cell? The French had gained nothing by the peace! Was it nothing to have procured those restraints which they could neither burst through nor surmount, to be voluntarily withdrawn? The preliminaries of peace; the treaty of Amiens; had they not, like the spell of a magician, like the movement of some talisman, laid open, in an instant, to France, the obstructed passages to the West Indies, to Africa, to Asia, to every region to which she might otherwise have long struggled in vain to make her way? The sudden restitution of St. Domingo to the dominion of France, was not that an effect of the peace? To what but the peace did she owe the advantages of that access which she gained by the acquisition of Louisiana to the back settlements of America? While the issue of the contest remained yet uncertain, France possessed that confirmed power in Italy to which she has since attained. We may judge whether France has not gained by the peace, by reflecting whether, if we were now to renew the war, we could renew it with all these pledges for success which we held in our hands at the cessation of hostilities? The Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fox) has talked of the irritations of a paper war between the two countries, of its contemptible meanness, and of its being yet more foolish than irritating. But if we are to shut out from the people of this country all knowledge of the designs and conduct of the French rulers, it were difficult to understand how they should be prepared to meet any meditated hostilities with just indignation and resolution, till they were at our very gates, or rather kindling to a conflagration the very fires on our hearths. The Hon. Gentleman talks of the error of fine-spun and distant speculations; then refers us to Machiavel for an account of the wonderful and happy things to be expected from the blessed agency of time and chance. But time and chance rarely do much in favour of men who can do nothing to support themselves. To time and chance none ever trusted less than the French. Who would bet upon the uncertainties of the dice when he might venture his money upon the sure calculations to which it is possible to subject a game at chess? Look back to the most distant era of French ambition to sway in the system of Europe. Buonaparté has but accomplished schemes that were conceived by Henry IV. and his minister Sully, and have been ever since uniformly pursued. And is it in this state of things that the Hon. Gentleman is to come, and with a voice, than which an enemy's ambassador could propose nothing more dangerous, to call to us, that we have nothing left but to trust to time and chance; to be quiet, lest we should be attacked; to dread the force of a population so much superior to our own; to hope well of our commerce, but to be comforted in the thought, that, when our trade and wealth are ravished from us, we shall have nothing left to provoke an enemy's desires? Did Buonaparté send a friend to solicit the interests of his ambition in this country; what else could he wisely enjoin him, to dissolve all manly resolution in the hearts of our people, than by such arguments to impress a general persuasion of the necessity to lay us hopelessly down in the charms of such a peace? [We particularly regret our inability, on account of the general length of the debate, to add here, a very beautiful and ingenious argument on the utility of continental connexions to Britain, and in defence of the fairness and honour of our allies in the late war, which Mr. Windham laboured in considerable detail, in answer to some things which had been previously thrown out by Mr. Wilberforce.]

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed, that the speech of his Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Windham) was precisely in the same strain of despondency as that which he had delivered on the motion for the address.

The general tenour of his arguments, however, was applicable either to a state of war or to a state of peace, though certainly in a greater degree to the latter. He was perfectly aware of the principles upon which that Right Hon. Gentleman had stated his opposition to the peace, and he gave him full credit for the manly, spirited, and consistent manner in which he had always avowed his sentiments. If he understood his arguments of that night, he supposed it to be the Right Hon. Gentleman's opinion, that upon the whole it was desirable that this country, on the general ground of security, should be restored to that situation from which it was taken by the treaty of Amiens. In that view he spoke of the evils which would be averted, that the French would not now be in possession of Louisiana, or of St. Domingo, and that the British power would still remain superior in the Mediterranean. The effect of the arguments on the other side of the House would be, not only to renew, but to render war perpetual. Mr. Addington then adverted to what had fallen from a Noble Lord in the course of the debate: that Noble Lord had asserted a proposition which was not maintainable, namely, that it was impossible hostilities could be renewed. The House would do him the justice to recollect, that in the very discussion of the treaty of peace, he had insisted that measure was not taken on account of any deficiency in our means to carry on the war. He had disclaimed the plea of necessity; and in the present instance he would aver, in opposition to the Noble Lord, that if the honour or the security of the country demanded the alternative, it had the means of supporting a contest of seven or eight years duration, without imposing any burdens on the people, but such as would be borne with cheerfulness. This allegation was not lightly made, but was the result of deliberate and minute investigation. With respect to the Noble Lord's objections to the persons of those who composed the present Administration, and his idea of their being unfit for their situations, he conceived him to object principally on the grounds of an imputed want of energy and vigour in their conduct. But he would ask the Noble Lord, what part of their conduct, either before or since the peace, justified such an imputation? They followed up the plans of their predecessors, with respect to the northern hostilities, with vigour and effect; their preparations for the defence and security of the country discovered no want of promptitude or energy; they sent adequate reinforcements to the army in Egypt; they detached a squadron to block up Cadiz, and to watch the Spanish coasts; and since the peace, nothing of the nature alluded to could be charged upon them: but they would be deserving of censure did they disarm to the extent which the Noble Lord and his friends at one time deemed proper. For these reasons he was induced to think, and as there were no specific grounds urged, that their real crime in the Noble Lord's eyes was their enjoying the confidence of the Sovereign, and being instrumental in giving peace to their country. He then entered into some detailed calculations to shew that the situation of the country was considerably improved by the peace, and that her strength and resources were such as placed her above every apprehension of danger in those points of view contended for on the other side of the House. Speaking of what had appeared in public prints in both countries, he expressed his concurrence with what fell from an Hon. Gentleman on that head: those kinds of observations were, he thought, equally unworthy the good sense, the prudence, and the manners of the country. However, it was not his wish, on that account, that a finger should be laid on the freedom of the British press. God forbid! The worst consequences which could ensue from those were light and insignificant, compared with what would be the effect of such an outrage! He assured the House, that Ministers would uphold the honour of the Sovereign and of the country; they would make no compromise, disgraceful, even for the preservation of peace, but would persevere in a firm but moderate line of conduct.

EARL TEMPLE could not accuse Mr. Addington of an intention of misrepresenting him; but in fact he had done so. What his Lordship had said, was not, that the country was incapable of supporting a war, but that under the present Administration there was no hope of war, and that they did not possess energy of character sufficient to ensure us safety in peace.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, there was one point he had forgot to state. It had been asked, what would be the economy of our peace establishment? In answer, he said, our peace establishment would be about twenty-five millions.

LORD MORPETH spoke in defence of the projet at Lisle, compared with the peace of Amiens. By that projet he said we maintained a scrupulous faith with our allies, and did not sacrifice them, as Portugal and the House of Orange had been sacrificed at Amiens.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, he referred to the projet at Lisle only to shew, that whatever difference existed between it and the treaty of Amiens, that difference would not, in the one more than in the other, have shielded this country against the ambition and aggrandizement of France.

LORD HAWKESBURY said, the only material difference between the projet of Lisle and the treaty of Amiens was, the Cape of Good Hope, and that this was not to be urged as a difference in fact. The projet at Lisle was but a projet; the peace at Amiens was an ultimatum. It could not be contended that a first projet was an ultimatum. At Lisle, Ministers naturally asked more than they would have been contented to take, and it was fair to infer they would have given up the Cape. Before we signed the peace of Amiens, Portugal had been invaded by a French army, and had signed a separate peace. Why should we have stipulated for Portugal, which had settled for herself? But even under these circumstances, when we discovered the cessions she had made in America, we obtained back a part of those cessions. With regard to the House of Orange, it was stipulated in the treaty of Amiens, that it should be indemnified in Germany.

Mr. CANNING contended, that the projet of Lisle was an ultimatum, as he knew it was the design of Ministers in the event of that proposal to have come upon the country, and to have appealed on the fairness of our offers in case they failed. He thought it invidious in Ministers to argue on the projet of Lisle, as they had done, situated as they were in regard to their predecessors.

Mr. BRAGGE asked, what further security would the possession of the Cape have been against the present aggrandizement of France? The reasoning of Mr. Addington this night, he said, could not be understood invidiously by his predecessor, as he (Mr. Pitt) had wholly approved of the peace.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, 2D DECEMBER 1802.

Mr. ALEXANDER brought up the Report of the Committee of Supply; and on the motion that the resolution for granting 50,000 seamen for the service of the ensuing year, be read a second time,

Mr. T. GRENVILLE rose, and spoke to the following effect:—"I rise, Sir, to express my astonishment at the mode of proceeding which is now proposed, a mode which places the House of Commons in quite a new situation. The Minister demands an extraordinary supply of seamen, without condescending to give the least explanation of the reasons which induce the necessity, or the purposes to which he means to apply them. I cannot hesitate to observe, that the conduct of the Ministers, whose duty it was to give this explanation, is novel, unprecedented, and unconstitutional; is disrespectful to this House; and this House will subscribe to its own disgrace, if it should assent to this proposition until the necessary explanation shall be given. When I came down yesterday, I confess I felt a good deal of anxiety, curiosity, and expectation, to hear what language Ministers would employ. I had some hope of hearing from them some exposition of their motives and views, some allusions to the state of Europe, some idea of what the country had to look for; something different from those indefinite terms they have heretofore used, terms equally full of firmness and humility, and implying no fixed or regular system of policy; at one time adopting the dignified language which becomes the Government of Great Britain; at another time chiming in the tone of submission which issued from the opposite side of the House; but I was disappointed: Ministers were utterly silent, and the vote in the Committee passed without a single observation. I was glad of the opportunity that presented itself on this occasion for Ministers to speak out; I was glad, because I thought upon such a subject it would be impossible for them to hold undecided or equivocal language; but they have evaded it; they have not thought proper to tell us any of the grounds upon which they have deemed it expedient thus to deviate from the practice of former times, thus to demand a large disposable force, productive of great expense, without informing us what danger we have to dread, and how far the force demanded will tend to avert that danger. I have looked in vain for some communication from them to supply the complete deficiency of information in his Majesty's speech, and in the debates upon it. To the address in answer to that speech I assented, because I could not consistently refuse it, for it was drawn up in such a way as to contain nothing exceptionable, and yet to want that which was most essentially necessary, intelligence as to our present state with respect to the continent. The speech, in fact, contained not a sentiment which was not applicable to any period of our history; it was a collection of truisms, without any opinion or statement peculiarly referring to the present times. How different the conduct of Ministers in former instances! how different at the peace of 1763, and at that of 1783 also! On the former occasion it was stated, in his Majesty's speech, that, from the disposition manifested by the powers with whom the treaty had been concluded, there was the fullest assurance for the continuance of peace; and in the speech of 1783, his Majesty expressed the happiness he felt in being able to inform the House that there was no reason to doubt the disposition of those with whom he had concluded peace, to preserve it inviolate. In both these speeches there were the most intelligible and specific declarations of the opinions of Ministers as to the state of Europe, and they were on both occasions equally explicit in debate, as to the views of policy they meant to pursue, and the force they thought necessary for the defence of the country. But now, for the first time, a Minister opens a session in time of peace with a speech composed of general terms, and applies to Parliament for a vote of 50,000 seamen, without attempting to describe to us the necessity which calls for such a force, or enabling us to judge how far this force may be proportioned to that necessity.

When the Minister, in June last, proposed a vote of 70,000 seamen, he was asked by an Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Tierney), what would be his probable peace establishment, and he replied, about 30,000. Why, then, does he now require 50,000? what change has taken place in our position? what new and unexpected dangers have arisen? what event has occurred since the Minister made this reply, and which his great political foresight could then calculate upon, to render this excess necessary? Has this vote reference to a peace or a war establishment? If to the former, Parliament and the country may think it excessive; if to the latter, such a force may be deemed inadequate: at present this House is incompetent to judge; and before we submit to the obloquy of assenting to the proposition now under discussion, I trust the Minister will be compelled to present such materials for our consideration, as may fully qualify us to decide this question. The question upon which we are to determine is this: What is the danger that threatens us, and is the state of our resources and preparation equal to resist it? Among the dangers that threaten us, let us consider the maritime state of Europe. When we look at Russia, in the first instance, we unfortunately find a strong partiality in that power toward the views of France, at least for some time back, though, from the moderate character of the present Emperor, and some late circumstances, there may be a little reason to hope that a different policy will soon prevail, and that our former relations of cordial friendship with that cabinet will be re-established. I am aware, that, in adverting to the Northern Confederacy, I am about to tread on delicate ground; but I must observe, that, in my opinion, what is called the convention, did not satisfactorily settle the point in dispute with that Confederacy; and what the Noble Secretary of State termed the explanatory convention, involved the matter in still greater perplexity. However, my principal reason for alluding to that Confederacy is, to take notice of an expression made use of, on a former occasion, by the Noble Secretary of State, to whom I mean no disrespect. That Noble Lord said, that the victory of Copenhagen created an obstacle in the treaty with the Northern Confederacy, which rendered it the most difficult negotiation in which he had been ever engaged. I must then remark, that the British statesman who could experience a difficulty in his negotiation with an enemy, from one of the most glorious victories ever obtained by the British fleet, and over that very enemy, affords no very flattering prospect of the consequences likely to ensue from his dexterous management at the court of Petersburg, or at any other court in Europe. But to proceed to a review of the maritime powers of Europe. In Holland, no one can be ignorant that great and unparalleled exertions are making to restore their navy; that a considerable number of large vessels are now building, and that many have been launched since the peace; and still greater efforts are making to recruit the fleets of France. I do not mean by this statement to express any apprehension of the superior power of the British navy, in the event of an engagement with any fleet, even with a disparity of force; but I wish the House and the country should keep in view the rapidly increasing maritime strength of that nation, whose gigantic power and influence is such, that it must be understood, that when we speak of the navy of France we speak of the navy of Europe. Before, therefore, we undervalue the naval force of France, we should consider the extent of the whole naval force of Europe; and more, that every acquisition she makes is a deduction from us; that it tells doubly against us; for every accession of territory to France is an exclusion of England. In the event of a war, the influence she has established on the continent would be sufficient utterly to exclude us; for what assistance could we hope to derive from Portugal? that country dare not, perhaps would not interfere. Let us only consider the state of the Portuguese, from the insult recently offered to a British officer in the port of Lisbon, in the presence of our Sovereign's son. Perhaps it may be stated that some satisfaction has been had; but I would ask, could such an indignity have been offered at a former period to the British flag while Portugal had the power or the will to respect us? was it probable? I quote this event only to show how differently the Portuguese are disposed to us to what they formerly were. The subserviency of Spain to France no man can doubt, and the endeavours of France to exclude us from every port in the Mediterranean; her insatiable ambition and her hostile views are equally obvious; her pretensions in Africa, and wherever she can interfere with the interests of our navy, must excite the attention of every man who feels for our security. The Morea and the republic of the Seven Isles are not even safe from her attacks; day after day adds something to her conquests; and if the last rumour can be credited, it is in contemplation to add Tuscany to her dominions. The French government takes possession of what she pleases, under the delusive and insulting pretence of interfering to tranquillize, and make other nations happy. On the subject of Switzerland, I cannot help saying a few words as to the conduct of Ministers; their strange and contradictory language, their affectation of dignity, and boast of not having committed the honour of the country; but what is the fact? Within the last two days I have been told that a gentleman, holding a very high situation in the Secretary of State's office, was a considerable time during, and previous to, the disturbances in Switzerland, resident at Constance, and held frequent conferences with the principal directors of the Swiss insurrection. If this anecdote be true, it does not tally with the assertion that Ministers have not committed the honour of the country. To return to the Mediterranean: the French government have succeeded in completely depriving us of every port in that sea, except Malta; and I say, if Government do their duty, they will retain that island. It is, I understand, retained; but why, I am ignorant, and so is the House. This forms a part of the explanation I desire from Ministers, together with the conditions upon which it is to be given up, if such a surrender is now intended. Is it only held until the court of Peterburgh agrees to guaranty it? and does that court decline to advance her money to join in that guarantee, notwithstanding the positive assertions of the Minister, on a former day, that she would? I should be happy if that power perseveres in her refusal, and then, of course, there will be no apology for abandoning that important fortress, which we ought to hold. Indeed I have no hesitation in saying that it is incumbent on Ministers to retain all the places covenanted by treaty to be given up, which are still in our possession. In the present circumstances of Europe, and from the conduct of France since the peace, I maintain that such a proceeding would be consistent with justice and equity, and it is evidently called for by every principle of policy. It has always been my opinion that Malta must be under the protection of England or France, and it is decidedly my opinion that it is essential to our best interests to hold it now, as a port for our navy. If in Europe the prospect is so discouraging, is there any consolation to be derived from the West or East Indies? Certainly not. We have every reason to apprehend dangerous consequences to our colonies, particularly Jamaica, from the force in St. Domingo; and that danger is aggravated, from a consideration of the force at Louisiana, and the recent cession of Martinique; a cession most extremely impolitic, and rather surprising if the report be genuine, which is universally believed, that some time before the meeting of Parliament, Ministers sent out orders to retain all the settlements which were not actually surrendered. If so, it is of moment to ascertain, whether Ministers, at the time they were calling for 50,000 seamen, in the apprehension of war, were justified in giving up the key of the French islands. Wherever we turn our eyes, we must see the progressive aggrandizement of France. She is, I understand, immediately to take possession of Cochin, in the East Indies, a place of no commerce, which can afford no attraction in that way. Then the only use it can be, and doubtless the only view with which it can be taken hold of by France, is, that it is a strong place, and will afford opportunities of negotiating with the native powers. From this circumstance, and from the language generally held by the French newspapers, I can have no doubt of the disposition of France to interfere for what, in th usual cant, they term the happiness of India. In such a state of our affairs in every quarter of the world, I will ask, can the House confirm the resolution of the Committee of Supply, without some explanation from Ministers, whether we are to be at war or peace? If the Right Hon. Gentleman will shew a necessity for this force, no rational Englishman can object to the vote; but perhaps that necessity may appear to demand a still larger force; and I confess that I, for one, should not wish to see a less; but I would desire to know how Ministers mean to apply it, what is to be their general use, &c.—(A smile on the Treasury Bench.) Mr. Grenville noticed it. Gentlemen may smile, supposing that I want to know the destination of this force; but I cannot look for any intelligence so improper. My object is to know the animus, the mind with which this force is to be employed. Is it to make war? Is it to enable Ministers to speak with weight, authority, and effect, in the affairs of Europe? They have had 70,000 seamen at their service, and yet that number did not encourage them to interfere on the continent with weight, authority, or effect. This experience forbids the hope that any force can communicate a firm and manly character to such an Administration. Perhaps they want this force, in order that it may lie still at home, waiting for the enemy to find it out. I should be happy to receive a satisfactory explanation from the Right Hon. Gentleman. If he declines any, I hope the House will decline to adopt his proposition, and I pledge myself to move for its recommitment."

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the House would do him the justice to believe, that it was not in consequence of the menace held out by the Right Hon. Gentleman, in the latter part of his speech, that he then rose to address them, nor did he think it necessary to say any thing to the imputation of disrespect and contempt, and a disposition to bring disgrace upon the House. The Right Hon. Gentleman charged him with being silent; he, on the other hand, charged the Right Hon. Gentleman with being present in his seat last night when the vote was passing, and of not having said a single word relating either to his own objections, or to the silence of the Ministers. Ministers, he said, had never expressed any confident expectations from the pacific views of France; and when it was urged against them that large military establishments were not kept up, though they themselves, on the first day, confessed the necessity of them, they answered to the untrue and unjust charge made against them of having disbanded a considerable part of the military force, that none of the military whatever had been disbanded, with the exception of some cavalry; and that they then maintained 50,000 seamen, though 43,000 were deemed sufficient in the first year of the war. In a few days afterwards the necessary estimates were presented, and on Tuesday last notice was actually given, that the vote required for the ensuing year would be 50,000 seamen, which were moved for yesterday. He had on that occasion reason to expect, from the dispositions manifested by certain Gentlemen, that some questions would be put, and some discussions ensue; and he was then prepared and ready to enter into any debate or explanation which circumstances might call for. Was this, on his part, any indication of neglect of duty? Had he begun himself, yesterday, upon any explanations, he had reason to expect that the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. Grenville) himself, in quitting the House, would be the first to complain that he had been unnecessarily wasting the time of the House upon a thing that was not wanted; for that he thought the vote, so far from being too large, was not perhaps enough. In the reference made to the speech of 1763, his Majesty expressed his confidence in the good intentions of other powers, and the number of seamen voted was 23,000. After the peace of 1763, the army was first reduced to 83,000, then to 43,000, and afterwards to 17,000, for guards and garrisons only. For the present year the vote was for 50,000 seamen; and in a very few days a Right Hon. Friend of his (the Secretary at War) would have to submit to them a proposal for a much larger military establishment than perhaps was in the contemplation of any Gentleman, because in the present state of Europe it was thought necessary to keep a greater defensive force than on ordinary occasions. He never yet, he said, had any reliance on France; his reliance was upon security, and that security could only be derived from a confidence of strength. The Right Hon. Gentleman seemed to think that Ministers should be compelled to give their reasons for maintaining such a force. He could not comply with what was asked, because he was not prepared to tell the relation between 50,000 men, and the present state of Europe. The Right Hon. Gentleman himself thought the number required scarcely sufficient; but if he wanted to find some of the reasons for keeping up a great naval force, he will find them partly in some peculiar expeditions. France, for instance, at present employed a very considerable naval force in attempting to reduce the island of St. Domingo. This made it necessary for England to maintain a proportionate force in the same seas; but in order to effect that object, it was necessary to preserve a greater force at home than would be otherwise requisite, in order to reinforce occasionally the squadrons on the West India station. Many of the ships on that station had already been a long time at sea, and the considerate system of the Board of Admiralty was to relieve such vessels from time to time, in such a manner as to add more to the comforts and convenience of the men. For this we must always have a home fleet in a constant state of

preparation; but still he wished more to rest the augmentation on the broader principle of the present state of Europe, and the necessity of such a powerful defensive system as would place the subjects of this country in a state of security, and a condition to enjoy the blessings of peace. The Right Hon. Gentleman said, he has extended his statement to a general view of the maritime state of the different countries of Europe, and a description of the dangers with which this country is threatened by it. Beginning his review with Russia, he expresses great concern at that court's shewing a disposition favourable to the views of France. He goes to the convention concluded with the Northern Powers; but as he has deferred that subject to some future discussion, for that subject I shall take the liberty of reserving myself. I cannot, however, pass over what he has attributed to my Noble Friend (Lord Hawkesbury), of having said, that the glorious victory off Copenhagen threw difficulties in the way of the subsequent negotiations. What he said was, that notwithstanding the previous event of the death of the Emperor Paul, and all the advantages of that victory, never excelled in splendour of execution, still the negotiations alluded to experienced many difficulties. The subject he next alluded to, is the great activity prevailing in the naval department of Holland, where new ships are constructing, old vessels repairing, and every exertion using to put the maritime power of that country on a formidable footing. But, considering its former greatness, how are its present efforts to be wondered at, or what cause of alarm is there? Having, in the course of the last war, lost 16 ships out of 41 they possessed before, it is endeavouring to replace that damage by increased building and repairing. I acknowledge that the maritime power of France, Spain, and Holland, must, under the present circumstances, be considered as one, and trust that England will take care never to view them in any other light; but the Right Hon. Gentleman is very much mistaken in representing that the navy of Russia, or of any of the other maritime powers, can in any way be taken as a part of the force of France. With regard to Portugal, it is notoriously true, that a flagrant insult was offered to the English flag; but that should not be taken as a proof of design or premeditated ill disposition; for no sooner was a representation made of it, than the court of Lisbon, without the smallest hesitation, hastened to repair the indignity, by sending all the persons concerned in the insult immediately to Lisbon, and took every step to afford the most complete and immediate satisfaction. That the satisfaction was ample, must be evident from the circumstance that the officer himself was satisfied, and made no farther complaint; and we all know that individuals of that description feel with delicacy and extreme sensibility upon every point of honour. With regard to the Mediterranean

States, Mr. A. proceeded to state that the Right Hon. Gentleman was as defective there as in many of his other observations, for the British fleet in that quarter was certainly at this time greatly superior to any force that could within a reasonable interval be possibly brought against it. "We have there," said he, "ten sail of the line under the command of Sir R. Bickerton; and here I am happy in the opportunity of contradicting reports that the French had 27 sail of the line at Toulon in readiness to put to sea. In contradiction to this ill-founded rumour, I can assert, on the authority of the gallant Admiral himself, that the French have not at Toulon more than five ships of the line ready for sea, and that at Carthage there is a still smaller number." He denied his ever having said, that we had obtained the guarantee of Russia for the manner in which arrangements were made for the government of Malta, though he might have said that we had obtained the guarantee of Malta. In order to shew the nature of that danger represented as threatening us from without, he stated, that at the commencement of the war the naval forces of the three powers were,

France - - -	80 ships of the line.
Spain, in 1797 - -	79 ditto.
Holland 27, but having built 13 more in the course of the war,
the total was - -	40 ditto.

Amount in the whole to 199

By the result of our operations in the progress of the war these were reduced to 123. The state of the combined navy at present was, of the line—France, 39; Spain, 68; Holland, 24—Total, 131. England, of the line, 196; frigates, 243; sloops, &c. 229—Total 659. By this it would appear, that our excess over the combined navy was no less than 60 sail of the line, exclusive of a very great superiority of smaller vessels.

Sir SIDNEY SMITH, in his maiden speech, expressed his cordial approbation of the proposition now before the House, nor could there, in his opinion, be a difference of sentiment respecting the expediency of keeping up such an establishment as would afford us the means of acting with energy, as circumstances might seem to require. There were one or two points, however, on which he begged leave to make a few observations. When votes were passed for keeping up a strong naval force, he trusted that the dock-yards would be kept on a respectable footing. It had come to his knowledge, that a very considerable number of individuals had been placed in circumstances of great distress in consequence of their dismissal from the situations in which they formerly supported themselves and their families with comfort. When he reflected on the high character of the Noble Lord who presided with so much ability over the naval department, when he turned his attention to the numbers of distressed seamen who were relieved by his Lordship's private bounty, he could not for a moment allow himself to think, that any thing like injustice to individuals would have been practised, from a deficiency in the allowance provided by the public for the support of this very important branch of the service. He threw out this as a matter worthy of consideration, and in the confidence that it would not escape the attention of Ministers. It was a point of infinite consequence, that those employed in any part of the naval services, but more especially in the dock-yards, should not be forced by extreme distress to enter into the service of other powers. It was his firm conviction that there were few who could be induced to enter into the service of our grand rival; and nothing but stern necessity could ever compel them to take a step against which the motives were so powerful. He had received numerous applications on this subject; but he had uniformly answered, that he was resolved not to be the representative of those who had done him the honour to elect him, in the antechambers of Ministers, or in the halls of office, but would take an opportunity of bringing the subject under consideration in his place as a member of that House. This he had now done, and he hoped the business would be attended to. On the general subject now before the House, he not only deprecated any reduction of the number of seamen to be employed, but was strongly inclined to think that it was hardly adequate to the circumstances in which the country was placed. It ought to be recollected by the House that a military force could not start into motion in this country in a moment, as on the continent, which had for so many years been formed into a great camp for war. For the sake of humanity, he hoped, that a speculative war would not be renewed; but that if unfortunately hostilities should become unavoidable, we should not be forced into it without adequate resources. There was with him an additional reason for wishing that the number of seamen to be kept up should rather be increased than diminished. It was drawn from the vast numbers of distressed seamen who in every quarter were to be found. The House would recollect that none but able-bodied seamen were employed in the merchant service. The consequence was, that the other descriptions of seamen were thrown wholly out of employment, and left to the precarious charity of the public, or to the very inadequate provision which national liberality assigned them. Was a sum not exceeding seven pounds a year any thing like an adequate provision for men who had lost a limb, or an eye, in the service of their country? He was convinced every one present was sensible of its inadequacy. Greenwich Hospital, though a grand monument of national beneficence, was not sufficiently comprehensive in the objects which it embraced; and even if it were extended, it was a question which admitted of a good deal of doubt, whether a mansion for disabled seamen might not be formed which might be more beneficial to the sufferers, and attended with less expense to the public. Instead of dismissing them to their homes with such an inadequate provision after all the long toils and perils of war, every dictate of policy suggested that they should quit the service impressed with gratitude for the ample provision made for them by their country, and ready, on the first call of danger, again to embark in its service. It was plain, that in the prospect of war, nothing was of such consequence as that of our navy should be promptly equipped, and nothing could so effectually promote this object as attaching the seamen to the service by gratitude. He took it for granted, however, when he said this, that war was not looked to either in this country or in France. Military men here, as in France, were anxious for a respite from the horrors of war, not from any selfish motives, but from a feeling of compassion for those brave men who might fall in any new contest. To feel compassion for human distress, occasioned by the war, was the inseparable attribute of true courage; and to the bravest spirits, victories were often painful. That there might, however, be a probability for the continuance of peace, it was above all things essential that we should have the means of speedily equipping our navy. He was inclined to believe that there existed on the part of the French government a desire to preserve the peace; and he was sure if such a disposition did exist, it would be materially strengthened by a formidable navy on the part of this country. Changes of government in France were, however, sudden and unexpected. He had himself had the misfortune to be present at two of these explosions, and in France they were considered as mere matters of course. They were like the mere decorations of a theatre, which excited no sort of uncommon emotion. On one of these occasions he had observed several of the turnkeys active in preparing lodgings for new prisoners, who were hourly expected. They made no secret of the light in which they viewed arrests, either of the governors or the governed. To his inquiries respecting the cause of such preparation, their answer was, that there had been high words in the Councils, and that new tenants for these lodgings might arrive that night. Their suspicions were just; for on that very same night, he believed, several members of the Councils actually took up their abode in prison. The period to which he alluded was the period which was styled the 18th Fructidor, in the favourite French gibberish. With the utmost composure the instruments of the most dreadful enormities walked about with their hangers, ready for some new atrocity; and deliberately consoled themselves, that in this tragedy they were only actors, not managers, nor even authors. With the persons then governing France, a subject for acting was never wanting. Julius Cæsar might have been introduced, but numerous other great subjects were untouched. Constantinople and Tipoo Saib might be introduced with great scenic effect; and, at all events, they had only to take an old stock-piece, which was sure at all times to be received with favour; and that was no other than the invasion of Britain. If the feelings of the French people were to be worked upon, out of 28 millions there never would be wanting numbers to undertake any desperate expedition. Supposing that such a convulsion as that to which he had alluded should unfortunately take place, there would be thousands ready to undertake any thing which should have for its object the destruction of this country. If our navy was kept on a respectable establishment, he had not, nor could any reasonable man entertain, the least apprehension from any such hostile and desperate efforts. From the situation which, during a year, he had held on the French coast, to watch the motions of their fleets, he could state with certainty to the House, that from the ports of France itself there was no danger to be apprehended of sudden invasion. In all their harbours, from which vessels adapted to the purpose of sudden invasion could sail, he had observed that there was no opportunity for vessels drawing more than 18 feet to leave them even at high water, without being artificially dragged beyond the pier, and the greatest number which in one day could leave the different ports of France could not exceed sixty, even on the largest calculation. Sudden invasion from those ports therefore was not to be dreaded. But the case was widely different since France had obtained so many ports on the eastern shores opposite those parts of this country which were most liable to invasion; for from the influence which France possessed over Holland, every Dutch port was to be supposed to afford, in every point of view, facilities for any project of sudden invasion. If, therefore, any of those Brutuses who had figured at the time to which he had already alluded, should succeed in putting an end to the life of the First Consul of France—an event which he for his part most heartily deprecated, and would, if any thing depended on him, use every means to prevent, from horror at a crime in all cases to be abhorred and execrated—a fleet might, in the course of one night, land forces in this country, and proceed to outrages the most dreadful, before invasion was anticipated. The Hon. and gallant Knight concluded with earnestly impressing on Ministers, in common with the House, the necessity of holding out every encouragement to those employed in the public service. He placed in a striking point of view the mischief which would result from an idea going abroad, that the honourable service of the country in the military or naval departments was not likely so rapidly to conduct to honours or rewards as services of a much less respectable kind. He begged the House to consider, that if any thing existed to justify such an idea, there would not be wanting persons to improve on the hint, however suggested. The Hon. Member, in illustration of his sentiments on this part of the subject, alluded to some notices of this description, which had appeared on the cover of a publication pretty generally circulated, in which the roads to the favour of Majesty and the honours of Knighthood were much more easily to be purchased than through the tedious and laborious toils of war. After reading this strange notice he sat down, proposing to hand it over to his Majesty's Attorney General, who would, no doubt, take such steps as the nature of the case required.

Mr. STURGES said he was ready to give his cordial vote for the number of seamen proposed to be employed, on the mere ground, that Ministers were the persons most competent to judge what was the number which the exigencies of the public service required. He could not, however, help observing, that so extraordinary a mode of voting the supplies for the public service, as that which Ministers had offered to the House, did not occur in the whole history of Parliamentary proceedings. It was, he was convinced, the first instance where a peace establishment, to so large an amount, had been proposed to be voted without the slightest communication to the House on the subject. The language held on this occasion by the Right Hon. Gentleman at the head of his Majesty's Councils, had filled him with inexpressible astonishment. What he begged leave to ask was, the situation of the country, and what was the language which the speech held out to the House and the country? The country was in a state of profound tranquillity, and the speech offered nothing but a prospect of the continuance of external peace. Nothing of a dread of rupture was hinted at; nothing was said of the necessity of supporting a large establishment. He was sure that this was the impression which the speech was calculated to create; and it was so understood by an Hon. Gentleman, not now present (Mr. Fox), who, when he gave his approbation to the address, begged that it might not be supposed, that, in voting for the address, he pledged himself to vote for the maintenance of a large establishment. He did not make these observations, because he thought that the proposition was liable to censure, but because the impression on his mind was, that such was the sense in which the business was understood, when the address to his Majesty was under discussion. He was not one of those who entertained the idea that our principal security consisted in the greatness of France. This idea, he was sorry to perceive, on a former occasion, had been apparently acquiesced in; and there were not wanting persons, both in the House and the country, who thought that French power contained within itself the seeds of decay. If French power had only risen from accidental circumstances, if it had only been derived from the conquest of defenceless states, he was ready to allow that there would have been some reason for entertaining such an opinion. When he saw, however, that every new conquest and every new aggrandizement was a real and solid accession of strength; when he saw every effort of nature combined with every exertion of art, conspiring to increase this strength; when he saw the left bank of the Rhine under the dominion of France; when he contemplated Holland, not merely allied to France, but under the domineering power of French influence; when he beheld the fortresses of Piedmont and the mountains of Switzerland seized upon by their rapacious and despotic hand; when every other state on the continent was subject to their destructive inroads, had he not a right to conclude that French ambition and French hostility were objects of the most watchful jealousy and unremitting precaution? But, had not the French government, in addition to the reasons for precaution drawn from this source, manifested the most obvious spirit of hostility? He was unwilling to go into any detail of the evidences of this hostility, nor would he say how far these acts formed a new ground of hostility. With Ministers, he most sincerely desired the continuance of peace. That he believed was the wish of every one present, and the only ground of difference was respecting the means to be employed for so important an end. He would remark, however, that the terms of the treaty were non-executed on our part; and this non-execution might either be the cause of war on the part of France, or the effect of a hostile spirit displayed by that power. Whether it was the cause or the effect, it was equally impossible for the House to determine, without a full communication of circumstances, which Ministers had thought proper to withhold. On this part of the subject, he begged leave to remind the House of the language employed by a Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Addington) on a former occasion, when he assured the House that there was no raison whatever to dread a rupture, and that he saw no reason to suppose that this peace might not be as lasting as any of those which had been concluded for the last century. If there ever had existed any disposition to doubt the truth of this statement, or more properly to have feared that so sanguine a prospect would never be realized, certainly the proposition of this night was not calculated to do them away. He, for his own part, trusted that the Right Hon. Gentleman was not too sanguine in the exhortations he had formed, and that it never would with truth be said of him—

Solus non timet.*

This would be a sort of supineness and security fatal to the best interests of the country; and he could not conclude what he had offered to the House more strongly, than by expressing his ardent wish that every precaution should be used to counteract any design on the safety of our foreign possessions, and, above all, to guard against any unexpected invasion of our native coasts.

Captain MARKHAM said, the House had been given to understand by an Hon. Gentleman (Sir S. Smith) that a number of persons had been dismissed from different dock-yards, but especially from the dock-yard more immediately connected with the city which the Hon. Gentleman had the honour to represent. True it was that a considerable number of persons had been dismissed in that dock-yard, in common with others; but he now took on himself to say, that no one person was dismissed who was not disabled from service by age, otherwise deficient in the discharge of his duty, or so grossly negligent, that he was a much fitter subject to be brought before a court of common law, than to be treated with the lenient sentence of dismissal from office. He had also to state, that in no case had a dismissal taken place in the case of deserving individuals where a pension had not been granted, and many had received a pension who had never formerly been allowed one under similar circumstances. He would not now say that the total effect of these regulations was hitherto experienced, because on several of the cases of augmentation of pensions the consent of his Majesty was previously necessary; but they were now in the direct train of execution; and he had no doubt, when completed, they would meet with the full and unreserved approbation of the House. He was confident, that, to the real friends of economy in the public service, the result would afford entire satisfaction. There was another description of persons dismissed from his Majesty's service, respecting whose case he had only to make one or two observations; these were the caulkers, who had united in a conspiracy with those in the same trade in the merchant yards in the river. The consequences of such a combination were serious in the greatest degree; and, in consequence of the application of the merchants and ship-owners, the Lords of the Admiralty had taken the subject into consideration. An offer had been made to these refractory caulkers to enter into the service of the merchants, and such of them as refused were immediately dismissed. On the subject of Greenwich Hospital, and the proposed augmentation of out-pensioners, he made a few observations. He desired the Right Hon. Gentleman to recollect that the former was a very late institution, and that it was designed only for the reception of those who had been so severely wounded as to be totally unqualified for labour, and those who were wounded, but not to the same extent, in his Majesty's service. For the relief of the other description of seamen, stated to be in a situation of deplorable distress, there was provided the chest at Chatham; and if these distressed objects were not provided with smart tickets from their respective captains, Government was nor to be taxed with this omission.

LORD HAWKESBURY said, that in proposing a vote for the army or navy, it had not been usual to precede the motion with many arguments, urging topics in support of it; he had thought it the less necessary in the present case, since it was in his Majesty's speech distinctly stated, and the sentiment was adopted in the address, that such measures ought to be pursued as would be essential for the security of this country. He believed that every Gentleman understood by this, that a large naval and military establishment would be necessary for that purpose. It was true there was no pledge on that subject, which was indeed manifested by the speech of an Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fox), who had laid in his claim to interpret the address in his own way, in the particular of the quantity of the force to be voted for our peace establishment; this he mentioned to shew that indeed there was no pledge, but also that there was a clear understanding in the House, and it was a general understanding, that the peace establishment should be augmented, for it was at that time distinctly stated and avowed by his Majesty's Ministers, that it was their intention to propose, on a day proper for that purpose, a very large military and naval establishment, and that on the ground of the circumstances of Europe as they considered them at that time; so that the augmentation now proposed could not be said to be by way of surprise on any Member in that House. That being the case, it would not be expected that any one of his Majesty's Ministers should again enter into the detail of that situation previous to a motion for the peace establishment. He would undertake to say, that if any such thing had been done, it would be a thing uncommon, if not unprecedented. He had now some experience in that House, and he would affirm, it was not the practice of that House to call for an explanation from Government, such as was now demanded, previous to the passing of such vote; it not only had never been required by the House, but it had never been required by those who were the most vehement opposers of Government. He remembered a peace establishment was proposed, larger than any former one; and a Member in that House, who at that time was in direct opposition to the measures of Government, delivered himself to the following effect:—"That if his Majesty's Ministers proposed the vote, as a permanent peace establishment, he should oppose it; but if there were any circumstances in the then state of Europe, that required it for the year, it should have his consent; because, although he did not confide in his Majesty's Ministers in general, yet that was a confidence which was at all events necessary for the safety of the State, such indeed as must be reposed for the moment in every government, and without which it could not exist.

He would therefore say, than in proposing the army or the navy, it was a point which necessarily called for the confidence of that House; it was therefore of course fair to ask it." He admitted, however, it was fair to ask Ministers, whether they proposed the establishment upon their views of a permanent policy, or upon circumstances peculiar to the time in which it was proposed; and that question, he apprehended, was already answered, by what transpired in that House on the subject of his Majesty's speech, and the address which followed it. The circumstances of Europe were such as rendered the force now proposed necessary in the opinion of his Majesty's Ministers; the House would be aware that he could not enter into the particulars of such circumstances without danger of the most serious detriment to the public service. He wished not to be understood to stand on any secret circumstances, or on any negotiation that might be thought to be depending, or on what Government peculiarly knew, or were judging of, but on the state of things, as that state is not only known to the House of Commons, but to every man in this country: and now he might take leave to observe, that from this general knowledge of the state of things, it was an almost universal opinion with those who paid any attention to it, that there should be, or ought to be, a pretty large peace establishment in this country; and that, as desirable as economy at all times was, as in peace it generally was, yet that there never was a moment in which there was less wisdom in observing what is commonly called economy, than the present; and it would not escape the observation of the House, that at the commencement of a contest we are never able to put forth our force in such a manner as to appear to advantage in the eyes of the world, or at all to resemble those efforts by which we had hitherto been able to terminate our contests. There were other reasons applicable to the state of both our navy and army establishment, and which required them to be larger than they had ever been in time of peace; and those were reasons connected with the question of economy, and that applied to the possible trouble and expense of recruiting, in the event of hostilities becoming unavoidable; so that, upon any view of the matter, it was impossible that our peace establishment should be what it had been. But, whatever might be the feelings or apprehensions of some Gentlemen on that subject, they must admit that the measure now proposed was no surprise on them, for it was distinctly avowed by his Majesty's Ministers, on the discussion of his Majesty's speech, and generally acquiesced in, that, under all the present circumstances of Europe, under the terms of the peace, and even upon the principle on which it was concluded, it would be proper in this country to keep up a larger peace establishment than ever was kept up in this country at any former period. Under such circumstances, it would be preposterous to say that the peace establishment of this country should be reduced to what it had been in former times. It was impossible to look upon the state of Belgium, or of Holland, and many other countries, without regretting their state, and without a feeling on our part that there should be a much larger establishment than this country ever kept in time of peace. It was not a question whether Europe was by the peace placed in the condition which could have been wished, for that was never assumed by any one; but the question with us was, since nothing was to be gained to us by the continuance of the war, whether we were not more likely to be secure in peace than by the continuance of the war? And another question was, whether that peace was more likely to be continued by a large peace establishment, or a reduced one? a question on which he apprehended there was not much variety of opinion. Now, if circumstances required the force proposed, it might be asked, whether this force was not larger than it was desirable to keep up a permanent peace establishment? That it was larger than was desirable to be kept up as a permanent peace establishment in this country, was true; at the same time he was ready to confess, it appeared to him necessary that we should keep it up, and even increase it, if the circumstances of Europe should require it. What might hereafter govern his Majesty's Ministers as to the extent of the force to be raised or to be kept up, it was impossible for him at present to say. They must hereafter, as they are now, be governed by a general view of the circumstances of Europe. He thought it was not enough to say, that, under the present circumstances of France and of all Europe, it is proper that Great Britain should have the force now proposed for the year 1803, and so on in the year 1804; but when the establishment of the year 1804 shall come to be voted, to consider the circumstances which may appear then, without being bound by any thing that might be adopted; so that we may then diminish or increase our force, as circumstances may require. It was, in his opinion, desirable at this time for the country to try the experiment of continuing that peace, that is to say, by all honourable means to continue the peace, but at the same time to prepare, and prepare with vigour, for war, if that should become necessary. But when he said we should endeavour to preserve peace, it must be in the spirit of peace, a spirit not at all derogatory from our honour, or inconsistent with our independence, but a spirit that should not hold out any species of irritation, which never could answer any good end, but must, if pursued, inevitably lead to hostility. It had been asked, whether peace, with a war establishment, was not war? He had heard that question more than once in that House; but if Gentlemen considered it seriously and fully, they would have no difficulty in seeing the very great difference between the expense of peace and war, even upon the large peace establishment now proposed. Compared with a moderate computation of the expense of war, it would make a difference of from 20 to 25 millions of money a year. He had nothing further to trouble the House with; he only wished to bring back to its consideration the point with which he began, namely, that the House did not usually call for much explanation in the proposal of a peace establishment, or of any establishment stated to be necessary for the safety of the country; that such practice was not consistent with that of the best times in the history of this country. It had been usual in those times to confide in Ministers, upon such occasions; but it was not on that ground that he submitted the propriety of the present vote; it was on a ground which was known to all the world, on the situation of things as they stand; such ground making it evident that this country ought to have a large peace establishment, either to prepare for war with new vigour, if that should become necessary, or to preserve peace with security and honour.

Mr. CANNING said, he felt himself called to deliver his opinion, though, had a judicious inquiry taken place, this debate never would have occurred. It seemed strange to him that the questions of his Right Hon. Friend should have been considered as injudicious or extraordinary; and the point of which he complained most justly warranted his censure—why forces of such description should be called for without any explanation of so unusual a measure at such a period. Not that he entertained any doubt of the necessity of the measure; but the emergency of the times and the critical situation of the country were truly alarming, and seriously portentous. But was that the respectful method which should be made use of towards Parliament? Was it decorous to introduce a novel measure with so little reserve, and without a single declaration of its necessity?—"What?" (had his Noble Friend exclaimed,) "was it unusual to state the estimates of navy and army?" Undoubtedly not. The custom had his concurrence; but it did not apply to the present instance: the point of complaint was, why an augmentation in time of peace was to take place, and when, at the same time, it was allowed that communications were necessary, but not one word had been delivered to Parliament. It had been asserted that the speech from the Throne had given sufficient intimation of the military establishment; but he contended that it did not specify that a large military establishment would be necessary; and an Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fox), on a former night, had declared, that he thought he should not disagree with the measure, yet he should not pledge himself to the support of the extent of the measure. If, then, that reservation was justifiable, and from the tenour of the speech it must be so, the necessary ground should be explained before Parliament should be required to give it its sanction upon the expediency of large establishments. To the circumstances attending the arrangement of these estimates, he was a stranger from his situation; but when he had the honour to act in political affairs, they originally were voted for 3 months—a circumstance deserving approbation, as it might be presumed, that, in voting a large establishment for such a time, there might be some negotiation pending, which this armament might help considerably towards hastening to a conclusion, and enforce the final arrangement in that period. But was this the case now? Could those hopes now be entertained? were they not completely blasted, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer changes, of his own accord, the usual times? If changes of circumstances had taken place since the time that a Right Hon. Gentleman moved, in a Committee, the estimates of the navy for 3 months, and the day after the Chancellor of the Exchequer should, in the space of one day, prolong them for the service of a year; how great must be the fluctuation of the affairs of the kingdom, and what we are to think when Parliament is held in total ignorance? He admitted, with his Noble Friend (Lord Hawkesbury), the policy of large peace establishments, as being most likely to render the efforts of the country, in case of animosity, effectual; but at the same time he approved highly of the inquisition of his Hon. Friends who had instituted it; he approved of the provocation of the debate: it was essential that the nature of the measure should be explained; but it was more prejudicial to state the country in a less degree of danger, and to represent its situation as less critical, than to over-rate its difficulty. He agreed with a gallant Officer who spoke before him, that we were to increase our exertions by degrees; that, had we known nothing of the power, the exertions, the enormous increase, the perfidy of France, the necessity of keeping up the spirit of the nation, as well as its energy, would be obvious; but, with such a country for a neighbour, vigilance and exertion were doubly necessary. What were the means adequate to that purpose, it had not been in his power to give any opinion of; those to whom his Majesty's councils were confided were the judges of that measure. On one particular he had agreed, and felt complete satisfaction with his Noble Friend, and on another point he felt dissatisfied; he could not help admiring how boldly he set out by declaring his intention in rising to answer an Hon. Baronet in an observation he made relative to Switzerland, and how very dexterously he had slid through his speech without saying a single word upon the subject; he had listened with a great deal of anxiety for the explanation, but nothing whatever had transpired. On this subject he could not take upon him to say how far the interference of this country would be prudent in the cause of an oppressed and outraged nation; he had heard that a communication on the subject had taken place; but, if any had, he hoped that it would be made known to the House, and he could also wish to know when. This question had been pressed upon the first night of the session, and now on a question when we are preparing the means of war in so unusually an extensive manner, it seemed as anxiously to be avoided. The question then appeared to be, that at a time when we are called upon for a large establishment, unusual, and differing from the former mode of delivering and conducting those statements, why no grounds had been declared to Parliament, no communications made? It was prima facie evident that unexpected occurrences had taken place, and the House was ignorant how far the honour of the country had been committed. He was concerned to find fault with his Noble Friend; but he was happy to acknowledge, that although there may be errors in his department, yet that he was not answerable for all of them. The case was different when he was in office, but he hoped no misconduct had taken place to prevent the communication of anything essential; and greatly changed must he be indeed, if the honour of the country should be reduced through him. His respect and esteem were built upon too sure a foundation; but he must conjure the House to uphold the spirit of the nation, not to let it sink into a depression, from which, when occasion might call for it, it might be found hard to animate and to raise it; that, as the danger was pressing, the efforts should be great; and as the Hon. and gallant Officer had said, that means of keeping up the honour of the British name should be the principal object in the direction of their measures; that the inquiries of his Right Hon. Friend were necessary and wise; and though the measure did not meet with any disapprobation from him in any degree, except, perhaps, merely to the extent which he might wish to have augmented rather than diminished; yet he must think, that the forbearance of his Majesty's Ministers from any communication of their reasons, was highly disrespectful and indecorous to Parliament.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was most extraordinary that persons of the sentiments which had been professed to-night, and on former occasions, should have accompanied those sentiments with the observations he had heard to-night. A compliment was expressed by the Right Hon. Gentleman who spoke last, to his Majesty's Ministers, for the vote which they proposed now to the House, and yet he censured them for observing a perfect silence and reserve, or rather concealment of the reason they had for proposing such vote; which reason, when given, was that which was perfectly notorious, so that Ministers were censured for being silent on what had been already spoken, reserved on what had been already communicated, and for concealing that which was already notorious; namely, that they proposed this vote on the state of things, as known already to every man in the country. This was certainly very curious; but who were they who complained upon this occasion? Not those, who, by their former declarations, had given them to understand they expected the peace establishment to be reduced, but those who agreed in the vote, and thought it came at the present time with peculiar propriety. If Ministers came and proposed 50,000 men, without any thing extraordinary to require it, then some explanation might reasonably be required; but to require explanation of that which was notorious, and to censure those whose measures were approved, was a novelty. At the commencement of the session the House heard a speech from the Right Hon. Gentleman who spoke last, an able and an eloquent speech, representing, in warm language, the dangers of the situation of this country, and the necessity of vigorous measures on our part, and applauding the address then proposed; and yet now Ministers were to be censured. Here the House was assembled on a question in which there was no difference of opinion, and yet there appeared to be much discontent. One would suppose there was something proposed which called forth the real indignation of some Members; and yet what was the end of it? Why, truly, that the measure now before the House was just what they themselves would have proposed, if they had had an opportunity of proposing it; which proves to my mind, said the Learned Gentleman, that if they had an opportunity of proposing it, you would not have heard of their opposition: it is not then to the proposal that they object, but to the man who proposes. It has been stated with great candour to-night, that if Ministers were removed, every thing would go on very well; so that, after that, there was no mystery in Gentlemen appearing to censure Ministers, though, in their consciences, they were bound to applaud their measures. Ministers say, "We do not think it advisable to 'commence hostility at this time.'" "So do I," says the Right Hon. Gentleman. Ministers say, "But it is proper that we should 'be prepared for the alternative, if hostility 'should become unavoidable.'" "So do I," says the Right Hon. Gentleman; and yet, by his manner, one would suppose he held a contrary opinion. The Learned Gentleman concluded with expressing a wish that while Gentlemen's votes were for Administration, their manner should not appear to be hostile.

Dr. LAWRENCE expressed his dissent from the sentiments of the Learned Gentleman. It was the mere artifice of an orator to take off the attention of his audience from the question in debate, to individuals who took a part in it. He maintained that Ministers had not laid before the House proper information preparatory to this vote. He censured the practice of voting any thing upon the rumours of newspapers; they were not authentic sources of information fit for the proceedings of the House: they ought to vote nothing but on official information. He did not object to the vote, but he feared it might be found too small. He then took a view of political events upon the continent; hinted that France was increasing her strength with the most alarming vigilance, while we had been neglecting ours, &c. for which he disapproved of the conduct of Ministers; and expatiated on the above topics at considerable length.—All the resolutions were read and agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, 8TH DECEMBER 1802.

Peace Establishment.—On the motion of the Secretary at War, the House resolved itself, pursuant to the order of the day, into a Committee of Supply, and there were referred to the said Committee the army estimates laid before the House on the 1st December, and the ordnance estimates for Great Britain, presented the 3d December.

The SECRETARY at WAR.—"I rise, Sir, to propose the establishment of the army for the ensuing year; and before I enter into the particulars of the statement, as to the extent, the nature, and the distribution of the force proposed to be kept up, I beg leave to offer a very short general view of the motives and circumstances which induced his Majesty's Ministers to require such a force. The estimates now on the table exceed in number and expense any thing that this country has known in any former period of peace, and upon this different opinions have arisen. The main question for the decision of the House is, whether the circumstances of the present times be such as to render such a force as is now proposed necessary; and if this should be decided in the affirmative, it will then remain to determine whether the division and description of the force be the most eligible, and whether its distribution be such as is best accommodated to the exigencies of the public service. That in the present time a larger force is necessary for the security of Great Britain than at former periods of peace, it is hardly necessary for me to waste time in attempting to prove. The circumstances of Europe at large, and the relative situation of this country, are too obvious to escape the observation of any thinking man. The overgrown power of France, arrived to a magnitude beyond that which the ambition of Louis XIV. projected; the menacing attitude of that country, the ambition and enterprise of its present government, have not only brought these feelings home to every British spirit, but have also impressed them deeply on every rational mind in Europe. The state of the question has already been distinctly laid down, as to the conduct we are to pursue under these circumstances; to maintain the present peace as long as we can with honour; to fulfil the conditions of it, as far as depends on us, with exactness and good faith; to abstain from all irritating language, but to resist all hostile aggression. It is our duty to be well prepared, and our preparations should be strong, as well on land as at sea. Our navy alone, however great, is not sufficient to guard the whole extent of our possessions, widely as they are spread through every quarter of the globe. It will be sufficient to remind the Committee, that France is now in possession of the Netherlands, of Holland, of the course of the Meuse and the Lower Rhine, and the fortresses on the banks of these rivers. This is the first time that Parliament has been called upon to vote a peace establishment under such circumstances, and therefore I was much surprised when I heard a Gentleman (Mr. Fox) maintain, that there was no reason why a larger establishment than usual in former periods of peace should be maintained in Great Britain; and that there were reasons why even a smaller force would suffice every where but in the West Indies, for there even he did not think the increase unnecessary. Let the Hon. Gentleman consider, that in the last peace Holland was friendly to us; the Netherlands were under the dominion of Austria; and the course of the Rhine, down from Alsace, was in the hands of friendly powers. Another circumstance material for consideration, is the actual military state of our neighbour, and his permanent establishment, of which I will take a short view, not with a design to excite any idea of keeping up a proportionate establishment here, but merely to shew that there is a necessity for making some increase, if we wish to provide for our own security.

The French military establishment for the present year consists of 84 regiments of cavalry, consisting each of four squadrons, at 150 men a squadron - - - - -	Men.
110 Demi-brigades of the line, and 130 of light infantry - - - - -	46,350
10 Demi-brigades of veterans for garrisons - - - - -	13,160
Artillery - - - - -	26,600

Making a total regular established force of - - - - - 427,110

And if to these are added 27 legions of gendarmerie, and other persons in arms, and liable to be called out, the French government has at command - - - - - 929,900

Such being the geographical position, and such the military power of France, no man can deny the necessity of an increased establishment on our part. I have been long adverse to the parsimonious system of peace establishments. I am satisfied, that though no considerable evil has befallen this country in consequence of the smallness of its armed force in times of peace, much mischief might have befallen, and our safety might have been much endangered, if the enterprise of our rivals had been proportioned to the hatred by which they now shew themselves actuated towards us. No hope can be entertained of enjoying repose without a just sense of national security; nor has any nation a right to expect that it will remain unmolested, unless it possesses such means of defence as render it dangerous for any rival power to insult its honour or to invade its rights. Without these means of defence no treaty is secure; but with such means, any treaty whatsoever may remain inviolate for a number of years. The maintenance of standing armies is generally censured as being attended with certain expense, and being eventually dangerous to the constitution; and unquestionably the smallest standing army is so, unless constitutional, authorized, and established. But we know very well that ever since the Revolution, and in the best administered times of our constitution, such armies have been admitted and maintained. It has been said by an ancient writer, that good laws must be maintained by good armies, and good armies by good discipline. In these times it is impossible that laws or constitutions can be maintained without a force capable of protecting and securing our independence by sea and by land. I do not see how any objection can be made to the increase now proposed, and I go on this ground merely, the absolute necessity of such an augmentation; for if this augmentation be not necessary, then there is no need of any augmentation at all. But if it was deemed necessary in times of no danger to keep up 24,000, 30,000, and 40,000 men, surely it will not be deemed unnecessary, unadvisable, or unconstitutional, in these times of danger and difficulty, to maintain a greater number. It has been said, that armies cannot be subsisted in times of actual war, but by husbanding the means of their support, and carrying the wealth and credit of the country to the highest. I am ready to allow that the credit of the country ought to be maintained, and its wealth augmented as much as possible. If we omit to provide a military force proportioned to the urgency of occasions, our honour is compromised, and we are left exposed to danger without a resource. For when, according to the best information that can be collected from the most authentic sources, 100,000 men are the number sufficient for the security of the country, and fewer are deemed insufficient, the Hon. Gentleman cannot mean that the maintenance of that number is impolitic. Wealth, in my opinion, however it may be increased, cannot be deemed secure without a respectable military force. Money has, it is true, been called the sinew of war; but that sinew cannot preserve its tone, without a body, and the body here is an army ready to be resorted to without loss of time. I have to mention Ceylon and Trinidad, newly added to our dominions, require an increase proportioned to their extent and importance, an absolute increase without any relative consideration of times or circumstances. It is meant to keep up 3 regiments of horse guards, and 27 of dragoon guards and dragoons, on the same regulation as in the last peace; the 27th regiment to be kept up, because the 5th has been discharged. The general division is to be 8 troops in a regiment, each troop to consist of 60 rank and file; of these, 10 to be dismounted. The dismounted men will be disciplined like the others, while they afford a saving to the public of 50,000*l.* a year; and at the same time can occasion no material delay, even in case of urgency, as horses are much more easily procured than men. The foot guards, as usual, to consist of 3 regiments, 1 of 3 battalions, and the other 2 of 2 battalions each: 75 men to a company, as the other regiments. The total of cavalry 17,250, total of foot guards 6060; 102 battalions of foot, consisting of the numbered regiments up to the 93d, with 2 battalions of the Royals, the 2d battalion of the 52d, a very fine corps, 5 battalions of the 60th, and 5 battalions of the 94th, at 75 rank and file a company, with the exception of those on India service, which were to have 75 men in a company, for the purpose of keeping up the numbers in that distant station. Six West India regiments, 6 of the 12 kept up last year having been reduced. These troops, consisting of men of colour, are found useful for many services in the West Indies, which Europeans cannot perform, and, when mixed with Europeans, form a very respectable force in the field: the 6 regiments consist of 4158 men. To these are to be added the foreign corps, consisting of the King's German regiment, Stuart's regiment, which distinguished itself so much in Egypt; 3 Swiss regiments, those of Meuron, Rohan, and Watteville; making all together 3532 men. The staff corps, consisting of 4 companies, and the corps of wagoners, which had been found extremely useful. The total of this force, including the regiments serving in India, and comuting officers, is 128,909. I now come to the distribution. Sixty thousand rank and file, including 15,000 cavalry, are to serve as guards and garrisons in Great Britain and Ireland. A body of 30,000 men for the plantations, and the remainder of the force to be employed in India. I will now state, particularly, the force in India, which consists of 3 regiments of dragoons, and 14 British regiments of foot, consisting of 16,100 men, and the regiment of Meuron, consisting of 1150 men. The troops now in India cannot come home till late, and it is, therefore, difficult to give a precise statement respecting them. There are now 17 battalions there, and it is intended that 14 shall be kept there. The total expense of guards and garrisons, and the plantation estimate, including India, will be about 4 015,000*l.* (Here Mr. Fox asked across the table, whether the garrison battalions were included in this calculation? He believed not, with them the whole force would be 1,000,000 men.) The Hon. Gentleman. I did omit the garrison battalions, consisting of 5000 men. It has been found expedient to form seven new garrison battalions on a better foundation; they are on a plan likely to prove more efficacious than the former, which rendered this force by no means adequate in service to the expense with which it bore upon the country. It has been thought expedient to abolish the name of invalids, to which contemptuous ideas were attached, as if of a man walking on a crutch, and unable to manage a musket or a bayonet. It is intended that they shall be effective men, and they are to have a board of officers, by whom redress of all complaints is to be made. The difference of expense between these and the invalids is about 5000*l.* the difference between them and troops of the line is between 35 and 40,000*l.* The clothing for these corps is this year to be issued out of the King's stores, and consequently there are to be no charges incurred this year for clothing them. These battalions are able to occupy garrisons, and to do service in several posts which would otherwise be maintained by regiments of the line, consequently these regiments will be at liberty for other services. I am now to notice to the Committee the mode by which this plan is more economical than keeping up a smaller proportion of officers. First, the battalions and squadrons are really capable of service, without waiting to recruit, and admit of increase, without breaking the hearts of officers in the beginning of a war, by raising new corps, and bringing men into the field who had seen no service. The addition of 1 lieutenant and 25 men to each company in the cavalry, gives an addition of 5000 in the infantry; 1 lieutenant and 25 men for each company gives an increase of 250 rank and file in each battalion, and a total addition of 25,000 rank and file, with 1030 lieutenants. The whole addition thus made is 30,000 men, with the expense of only a few additional officers. By the addition of one company to each regiment of cavalry, and two to each regiment of infantry, there is a further increase of 20,000 men. I shall forbear to enter further into the particulars of the organization, as every Gentleman is in possession of the abstract; but I am ready to answer any question that may be put to me. All the services in the army department will amount to 5,270,000*l.* and all those annexed expenses not in the paper, including the half-pay to reduced officers, and the out-pensioners of Chelsea and Kilmainham (the expense of the garrison battalions I cannot yet exactly tell), will not exceed the similar expenses in 1801. The expense of the military column is 7000*l.*; and it is for the pleasure of Parliament to grant a sum for the support of the military. The total of the military expense will be about 5,500,000*l.* This expense is certainly great, but it is less than that of last year by 2,270,000*l.* and less than that of the last year of the war by 10,130,000*l.* A difficulty arose, from the army proposed to be kept up last year, but to which, in fact, we could never arrive. There is an increase of 8,525 men this year, and an additional expense of 65,000*l.*: there has been, at the same time, a saving in several items. The expense of barracks is less by 300,000*l.*; and in the half-pay and other items there has been a proportionate diminution. In mentioning the increase of force since last year, I must notice a charge made on his Majesty's Ministers of having hastily, improvidently, and unwisely reduced the armed force of the country, when, as those persons themselves admitted, the increase now demanded was not too considerable. I will now proceed to shew that these charges were without foundation. On the 1st October 1801, there were under arms 250,000 men of all descriptions; of these, 123,343 men of all descriptions have been reduced. 1st, The cavalry amounted at that time to 25,000 men; a force not thought necessary, and for that reason, as well as because it was the most expensive, the reduction commenced with it, and 10,493 men were reduced. The militia of Great Britain and Ireland were discharged to the amount of 71,000 men. It is understood that the militia is always to be called out at the commencement of a war, and discharged on the conclusion of peace; but the fencible regiments come more strictly under this description, and were therefore immediately disbanded, to the number of 20,679 men. The invalids, to the number of 5172, were reduced, because it had been resolved to form the out-pensioners into a more effectual force. The foreign corps were reduced to the number of 8945 men; a force which we were glad to spare, and which, when any reduction was necessary, we thought it most politic to reduce; for when British troops were disbanded, who would think of maintaining foreigners, unless they were in situations where we could not dismiss them? All other descriptions of men dismissed amounted to 7025 men, which number alone constitutes the strict and regular difference between the British infantry, then and now. And if it be considered, that of these 7000, some had enlisted to serve for a limited time, and though they were not strictly entitled to their discharge, yet as the act of Parliament is so drawn as to give them reason to think they were entitled to it, and many of them were induced to enlist, by having it so explained; it seemed inconsistent with that good faith which the Government should always maintain with the people, to refuse to discharge them; but I can assure the Gentlemen who brought those charges, that no exertion was omitted to induce them to enlist regularly in other corps, and so many did enlist, that 19 or 20 battalions were filled up, while the reduction did not take away more than 6 or 7. Of these 7000, many were discharged from the hospitals, and many were discharged for infirmities, on their return from long foreign service. This is the only foundation on which the charge of improvident reduction rests. But look at the force kept up, and the picture now afforded by the British army. This army was never more respectable, never in better subordination, never in better order than now; it was never composed of more able and efficient men, never actuated by a nobler military spirit, with a number of able, experienced, and brave general officers, many of them in the flower of their age, uniting the vigour and enterprise of youth with the temper and wisdom of more advanced years; regulated by a Prince possessed of an uncommon understanding in military affairs, indefatigable in his attention to business, and eminently just in discharging the duties of his office. For this respectable army, and the facility of augmenting its military force, the country is partly indebted to the Hon. Gentleman on the other side, who is entitled to the praise of having given us the command of such a force, with the facility of making an addition of 20,000 men; besides an easy resource in the militia of Ireland of 20,000 men more, exclusive of the yeomanry and volunteer corps, who have agreed to continue their services. Of these last, 8000 rank and file have been already enrolled in Great Britain, chiefly cavalry. In Ireland the enrolment has been above double that number, amounting to 10,000 cavalry, and a still greater number of infantry. Putting all together, we have a total force of 200,000 men, exclusive of the army in India; a force of such a magnitude, and of such a description, as to present no very alluring prospect to any foreign power that may be disposed to attack us. I conclude, Sir, with moving the first resolution, That 66,574 men be voted for guards and garrisons in Ireland, from the 1st of Dec. 1802, to the 1st Dec. 1803."

Mr. BANKS.—"Sir, the Hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, has said nothing which does not to me appear, if properly considered, to have the weight of a strong reason against that increase of our military establishments, which his estimates propose. It is because France is now more formidable than at any former æra in her history; because her rivalry against this country is now more than ever inflamed by inordinate ambition, and exasperated by deep resentments; because the arms of her political influence are, every where on the continent, multiplied an hundred fold; because she menaces this country from many more points than before the revolution; because the very spirit of the whole nation breathes only war and conquest; because its leader reigns over his own people, only by exciting them to trample all others under their feet: it is expressly for these reasons that I should wish anxiously to spare any unseasonable waste of the national resources, and lavish on the apparatus of war nothing but what is indispensably requisite to render that apparatus fully efficient for the country's safety. The Right Hon. Gentleman tells us, that the military establishment of France consists, at this moment, of very little less than 500,000 men. But, has it not been always the policy of France to maintain an army out of all proportion greater than any that we could oppose to it, if it had been even the opinion of our ancestors, that, to be secure against French invasion, they must have something like an equality of military force at all times ready to defeat it? The military peace establishment of France, under its monarchs of the House of Bourbon, was not less disproportionately greater, Sir, than that which it has been during these two last centuries usual for the English government to maintain, than would be the French standing army under the First Consul, in comparison with such a military peace establishment for Great Britain as it was, before the war, the policy of our government to keep on foot. But if we must have a great military establishment during peace, are there no means of answering all the uses which can be proposed in it without withdrawing 110,000 men so entirely from all the services of productive labour? It has been usual in the military establishment of Prussia, and others on the continent, to dismiss the soldiers to the labours of husbandry for the greater part of the year; and might not such an arrangement, in our present circumstances, be advantageously adopted in Britain? or, is there no possibility of modifying the volunteer, the fencibles, or the militia service, in such a manner as to answer any use of a great standing army, without exhausting by such an expense, and by devoting to idleness, so large a proportion of those who might be the most beneficially employed in that industry which sustains the whole?"

Sir W. W. WYNNÉ complained, that Ministers had made the reductions in the army with inconsiderate haste; had disbanded corps formed out of the Irish fencibles, which had no right to claim their dismissal on account of any thing in the conditions on which they were enlisted; had subjected the officers of the disbanded corps to undue inconveniences; and had, in general, acted in such a manner as to evince, that they were unfit to be trusted with the force of which they now made a demand.

EARL TEMPLE.—“I do not now rise, Sir, to move the Committee in opposition to the estimates. So far as any thing like energy can be, by the endeavours of me and my friends, communicated to the feeble measures and spiritless counsels of the present Administration, I shall, for the sake of my country, rejoice to support them; and if it were possible to conceive, that by their hands this country can, in the present crisis of its fate, be saved; if I were not convinced that Buonaparté has no other object so much at heart as the entire subjugation of this empire; and that by every measure, whether of concession, of connivance, or even of remonstrance, which those now at the helm of our affairs may be pleased to take in regard to him, the consummation of his dearest purpose is, to our confusion, incessantly advanced; if I could suppose, that, in trusting to them such a military force, we did more than put the military powers of the country into hands in which they must be inefficient and ridiculous, I should have been well content to give them my vote, upon this occasion, without thinking it necessary to make any remarks on the conduct of men, whose measures I do not directly oppose. They have affected to talk with a ridicule, of which the coolness and pointlessness were alien equally to the arch vivacity and fire of wit, and to the discretion of sound wisdom; they have affected thus to talk of the strangeness and harmlessness of those opposition arguments which lead to good government votes. But this is an anomaly to which no common share of weakness, irresolution, and confusion of head in an administration, could reduce the friends of their country. Abilities less than theirs were unequal to the achievement. And to what purpose put into their hands so powerful a military force? To be again reduced as soon as it shall have been voted? The Right Hon. the Secretary at War would persuade us that no part of the army was disbanded, except some battalions, whom particular engagements to the soldiers, or their feebleness, wounds, and disease, made it impossible to keep longer together. But the fact is, that one half of the army, both cavalry and infantry, was dismissed, dismissed at the very time when it should have seemed the most improper to lay down any arms which we yet retained in our hands; when the ruler of France was making, amid an ill-preserved semblance of peace, acquisitions more valuable than all that he had gained by the war. A number of battalions were entirely disbanded; in others, the number of the companies was reduced from 12 to 10, or 8, and the number of the men in each company from 100 to 60. This reduction pervaded the whole army, cavalry and infantry. The more boldly Buonaparté went on to set at nought the substance of the conditions of the peace, the farther he advanced to menace the actual safety of this country, so much the more haste did Ministers make to divest themselves of every means with which they might have dared to set bounds to his ambition. It appeared as if they were impatient to put it, as soon as possible, out of their power to come to blows, however insulted and abused. Such was their wise contrivance for keeping the peace. In June, July, August, September, down even to a considerably late date in October, they continued to disarm. At last, when the spirit of the country would no longer bear with their pusillanimity; when they dreaded to meet a Parliament to which they could not venture to suppose that English honour was not still dear; when they saw that even a little temporary forbearance from Buonaparté was not to be conciliated by all their servility of submission; when they had made England cheap and vile in the eyes of all Europe; then, at last, they bethought themselves of plucking up heart, and making as if they would yet act the man. But what an occasion, what a season did they choose! Why, of all things in the world, should the fate of Switzerland be the first to provoke their mighty minds to rise into opposition to the fiat of the First Consul? Was Switzerland a country having any near relations, local or political, to this country? Were the Swiss a people who had never before lived under the influence of France? Was there any decisive, conspicuous act of the First Consul, in regard to the Swiss, that evinced an hostility to this country, keener and more formidable than he had before, without scruple, displayed? Had they in their hands means of serving the Swiss more effectively than they could have acted in any previous case of interference to check Buonaparté's ambition? No, no; nothing of all this was the case. But, to shew that they were not utterly without spirit, that they were still not unwilling to take an interest in the affairs of continental Europe, they would choose an occasion beyond all others, absurdly unseasonable, to embroil themselves with a man to whom they had so lately bowed the knee. For this grand purpose, Mr. Moore was dispatched to Constance, and held conferences with the chiefs of the Swiss insurgents, of which God knows whether they may not have tended to mislead some of those unfortunate patriots to their ruin. It is when I see a train of conduct like this, Sir, that, though I vote every supply to Government, I am concerned to think to what hands such supplies are to be committed. Yes, Sir, while I oppose not the measures, I cannot but loudly declare my disapprobation of the men. There is but one man, on whom the wishes and hopes of the nation are fixed: he only is, in the present crisis, equal to save his country. I vote for the establishment proposed in the estimates: I wish that I could with a vote add to his Majesty's service Ministers fit to make a right use of it."

General MAITLAND said, the Hon. Gentleman who immediately followed the Secretary at War, had adverted to the practice of our ancestors, and to the wisdom of their practice. He was very far from denying the constitutional spirit under which they acted; but before we concluded upon that subject, we ought to consider what it was likely our ancestors would have done, had they been placed in our circumstances: he was warranted in saying, that if our ancestors had been surrounded with the circumstances which now surround us, they would have at least made as much preparation to meet any possible event, as we are now making; he said he was judging of what they would do, by looking at what they had done; and he would add, that all which had been said by the Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Banks), on the subject of our security being in economy, that economy did not apply to our situation at the present moment. But now he would take a short view of the speech of the Noble Lord who had just sat down, who had said that Ministers had not offered any argument for the establishment which they now proposed. To this he would answer, that arguments were unnecessary; if there were any who really wanted arguments upon the subject, he would begin with them, by asking what they thought of the present situation of Europe, whether that was enough to justify the vote now proposed? He would not now go over the state of all the powers of Europe, but he should just entreat the Committee to look at the present state of France; her power for offence and defence; and that, without any other consideration, although there were many others, would be a sufficient cause for the vote now before the Committee. He desired to look at the temper and condition of the governor and governed of that country. He was confident of this, that the most judicious men in France, as well as the rest of Europe, were convinced that at this moment the leading, ruling passion of the people of France was military enterprise; that the government of that country at present was the government of the sword; and that the person at the head of it was, if not the greatest or the first, the most ambitious general in Europe. Was there not something to be added to this? Our feelings were not hostile to France upon principles of general rivalry; but the rivalry of France towards us arose from the jealousy they felt at contemplating the happiness of this country, and they envied our constitution. With regard to Switzerland, he would only say that he agreed with the Secretary at War, as to the propriety of abstaining from the use of irritating language: but on that subject he would not venture to give a name to his feelings. If ever there was a breach of trust solemnly reposed, and shamefully violated, it was to be found in the conduct of France towards Switzerland; but what lesson did that teach him? that France having proved herself to have the will, we ought to take care that she shall not have the means to offend us. He looked at their preparations for sea and force by land, with great anxiety; although he had great pleasure in reflecting, that we had voted 50,000 seamen, and that 48,000 of them might be ready in a few days, if necessary; but whatever might be done by our navy, and every thing would be done that a navy could do, yet we must also have a considerable army; and under the auspices of his present illustrious Commander in Chief, every thing might be expected that a great army could accomplish. The Noble Lord had declared the incapacity of the present Minister. Now, if they were to be removed, the question was, who was likely to succeed them?

The Noble Lord could not think of the Hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. Fox); he could not think of wishing to see at the head of his Majesty's councils a man who had contributed to seal the death-warrant of his country, as the Noble Lord called the treaty of peace, for that Hon. Gentleman had always most decidedly expressed his approbation of the peace. Another Hon. Gentleman on the same bench with him might perhaps suit the disposition of the Noble Lord better (Mr. Windham we presume): he had declared that he should be rather for war than peace; or, if we tried to preserve peace, we should soon be forced into a situation of war, and then we should have to regret that we did not enter into war sooner, a distinction the General looked upon as being without a difference; but such men could not keep peace with France if they were ministers at the present moment, and that he was aware would not be acceptable to the people of this country; so that the Noble Lord and his administration would want that confidence, without which no administration in this free country could be permanent.

General TARLETON expressed his surprise at the opposition language employed by those Gentlemen who yet professed their intention of voting for the proposed establishment; for his part, he rejoiced at the conclusion of the war, because, among other reasons, it gave an evidence of our pacific disposition, and obtained us that character throughout Europe which we did not possess before. He was proud of the resolution which seemed to be implanted in the minds of the people, a resolution which would enable us to meet any attacks that the restless spirit or mad ambition of any enemy should venture to make. However, from the state of Europe, he saw the necessity of a large establishment for this country. France at present had subject to her power no less than 40 millions of people; and according to the French newspapers, two out of every three effective men were now raising as conscripts for the army. For what purpose is this large force to be placed in the hands of a man, certainly of the most transcendent abilities? a man, whom he would not abuse. He would not call him the disciple of Mahomet, for he recollected that the Koran was struck from his hands by a Member of that House (Sir S. Smith); but he must remark, that from the number of means France had to annoy us, it behoved us to be on our guard; for it would be absurd to rely, that such men as Buonaparté, Massena, and Berthier, would give up their favourite pursuit, would become pacific and mild individuals, inclined only to run a race with us in commerce and agriculture. He could place no confidence in that idea, for he believed that Buonaparté's pretensions to the character of a warrior could only be equalled by his rooted antipathy to this country, and we must therefore beware of his purpose and views.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT observed, that however unequal the present Ministers might be considered, he should regret to see them superseded by those Gentlemen who sat on the opposite bench (Mr. Fox's friends), between whom and the opposition on the other bench (Mr. Windham's), he said there was this material distinction, that the former continued throughout the whole course of the last war to throw every possible obstacle in the way of Administration, to propose every measure that could tend to embarrass Government; while the sole object of the latter obviously was, to serve and to secure the country. With respect to a Right Hon. Gentleman who had been alluded to in the course of the debate, whom all loyal men must respect, he did not understand that that Right Hon. Gentleman had manifested any desire to return to power. It had been said by an Hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House, that talcots were of no use to a minister; certainly they would not, but be rather dangerous, if with them were connected such opinions as had been mentioned, respecting the pacific dispositions of France; opinions calculated to lull this country into a reliance that might be fatal; opinions which savoured more of confidence and attachment to France, than was consistent with a fair attachment to England: if the object was to serve France, no other language could answer that end so well.

Mr. WHITREAD declared his full and complete concurrence in the sentiments expressed by Mr. Banks, that it would be much better policy, with a view to our defence, in case of any dangerous attack, to propose a smaller establishment, and to husband our resources. He could not approve the fluctuating judgment of Ministers. The estimates both for the army and navy were now much greater than were originally proposed. Why this change in their plans? He believed that the best safeguard for the country would be a fixed and steady system of policy, incapable of frequent wavering. Ministers should not suffer themselves to be driven from their purpose by the mere assertions or insinuations of a party. Why should the Right Hon. Gentleman raise his demand for the navy from 30,000 to 50,000 men? or why, though in the first instance stating that the army estimates would be necessary only for three months, come down again after a few hours consideration, and state that he thought proper to move the estimates for twelve months? He wished to know from the Right Hon. Gentleman whether he meant this proposition for the permanent peace establishment? and whether, if circumstances should alter, it was his intention to reduce that establishment? He desired to hear in what state things stood. Were the people really to enjoy the advantages of peace? The amount of the army of France, he contended, should not be adduced as any model by which we should square the number of our force for defence. If the state of the present French army, however, was to be compared with that kept up in time of peace by the former French governments, and we take into account the vast extension of French territory, it would be found that their number was not such as should excite alarm. If Gentlemen would only apply the common rule of "Do as you would be done by," to the proceedings of the French government, many of their apprehensions would vanish. What had been our own conduct? Immediately after peace was concluded, the Right Hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) applied himself diligently to the settlement of our finances, and the Noble Earl at the Admiralty has been some time actively engaged in putting our navy in a state of preparation, and in prosecution of his purpose has visited all our dock-yards, giving orders for repairs, and making reforms in almost every department. We are to have so many ships ready for sea on any emergency; yet France feels no alarm at this. We call them only mere measures of precaution. Why ascribe different motives to Buonaparté's visit to Boulogne, where the men are said to work by torchlight, and not unfrequently they are at a stand, if reports were correct, for want of money to pay them? Was that a just ground of alarm? Should it induce an apprehension that Buonaparté meant to break the peace? or should we be disturbed about Dunkirk, a place that, from the experience of the last war, it was manifest was of very little consequence to this country whether that port was fortified or not; quite as little as the importation of hemp into France, which excited so much the jealousy of some Gentlemen? Whatever his wishes might be as to Switzerland, he could not approve of any interference on our part in the affairs of that country; for we could effect nothing material with any force we possessed. There could be but one opinion as to the invasion of that country by the French troops; but he should imitate the Hon. General's (Maitland) promise, to abstain from stating that opinion, and he would do more than the Hon. Gentleman did—he would keep his promise. If, however, it shewed the ambition of Buonaparté, were his predecessors of the Bourbon family not liable to that charge? If there was perfidy in it, were not the Bourbons also guilty of perfidy? The Noble Secretary of State had stated on a former night that a former French government was, at the very time it was concluding a treaty of peace, occupied in framing new plans of hostility. France was not now, in fact, worse in any point of view than in former times, particularly with respect to ambition. Returning to the motion before the Committee, he mentioned, that, as France was not more powerful now than in June last, there was no ground for this high establishment.

The Right Hon. D. RYDER said, that he had no occasion, and therefore felt very little disposition, to reply to any attacks that might have been made upon Mr. Pitt's character; for the experience of nineteen years of an active political and useful life, must ever ensure him the gratitude of his country; neither did he see that it required to be added to the discussion which took place upon the navy estimates, nor could he expect any difference of opinion, as this vote was evidently founded on the same plan as the increase of 50,000 seamen. If the increase, however, did not take place, he much feared that this country may bid a long adieu to all its greatness. But it seemed that there were some Gentlemen inclined to think navies useless, armies something worse, and even all continental alliances of any kind absolutely detrimental. These alliances were even decried in such a manner as, perhaps, to render the formation of them impossible, or at least extremely difficult. When we behold the subjugation of the Swiss, and the progressive aggrandizement of France, was it proper language to say, "Let us sit still, and suffer France to devour all the rest of Europe, contented at her forbearance in making us the last whom she is likely to snap at?" According to the observations of one Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fox), we should remain quiet, in hopes the First Consul would in time remit his anger against us, and be satisfied with the punishment we had already suffered; but the same Hon. Gentleman in this afforded us but little consolation; for, in his opinion, we deserved that punishment, and the war ought to have terminated gloriously to France and ingloriously for this country. Thus after all we saw of this formidable rival, both before and since the termination of the war, we were advised to sit still, like patient plodding merchants, calculating how much more we could sell, and considering whether the ware of Stafford might be able to vie in the market with the manufactures of Seve. For his part, instead of blaming his Majesty's Ministers for not having prefaced the motion on the navy estimates by any speech, he should have thought it perhaps better if they had not, on this occasion, stated with so much precision the grounds which constituted the necessity of an increase. The thing was of itself so obviously plain, as to require neither arguments nor any statement of facts. The demand was for a military establishment, ready for any emergency that may arise, and not perhaps so much called for by any subsisting differences, but such as would place us in a situation to assist others, and, perhaps, in some not very far distant day, opposing a barrier to the encroachments of our aspiring neighbours. It was true, that heretofore we had always peace establishments comparatively small; but at no former period were we ever totally destitute of all continental alliances and connexions.

Mr. SHERIDAN.—“Sir, being in the situation alluded to by the Right Hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, of not being able to agree precisely with any of those that have preceded me, yet of being, at the same time, unwilling to give a silent vote upon the present occasion, I rise with some sentiments of reluctance. There is one thing, however, in which we all coincide; it is, that the present is a crisis so full of importance, and so perilous, that the House has a right to know the sentiments of all its members.—Sir, one of the circumstances I most regret in this debate is, the references that have been made to the characters and abilities of persons supposed to be fit to fill particular offices.—I feel this as a subject of regret; and feeling so, I am sorry that my Hon. Friend near me made any allusion even to one man, whom of all men upon earth I most love and respect, because I do view the crisis to be one of such moment and peril, and because, if ever there was a time in which we should prove to the people of England that we are above all party feelings, that we are above all party distinctions, that we are superior to any petty scramble for places and power, that time is the present. Sir, in speaking upon these topics, I do find a disposition in some Gentlemen to rebuke any man who shall deliver any opinion with respect to the First Consul of France. One Hon. Gentleman who rebuked an Hon. General that spoke before him, declared that he would not give his opinion with respect to the conduct of France to Switzerland; and what does his rebuke amount to? He confesses that upon that subject there can be but one opinion. Why then, Sir, he either adopts the opinion of the Hon. General, or not. If he does adopt it, he gives as strong an opinion against the conduct of France as can possibly be given. If he does not adopt it, why then all we can say is, that there are two opinions. But what, he asks, has Switzerland to do with the question? It has this to do with it—The Hon. General introduced the subject in this way—He contends that a power which is capable of such unprovoked aggression, and such perfidy, is the power that ought to be watched. But the Hon. Gentleman goes on to assert, that we have nothing to do with the case of Switzerland—nothing to do with France—nothing but with her power—nothing but her power? as if that were little. He asks too, Where is the great difference between France under the Bourbons and under her present ruler? Why, Sir, the Hon. General inferred, from the conduct of France, that with her growing power she had a growing disposition to do mischief. But is that power, demands the Hon. Gentleman, greater now than it was last June? Perhaps it is not, Sir. But her mischievous disposition is greater; and if I am asked to bring a proof of the truth of my assertion, I must bring the case of Switzerland. Sir, if I see a purposed contempt of the independence of a nation, if I see a perfidious disregard of the faith of treaties, if I see a power withdraw her assistance, only to return and entrap a country of freemen with greater certainty, why then I say there has been a change, and a great change too, and that such a power we have a right to watch. But, says the Hon. Gentleman, we have no right to make use of invectives against the First Consul of France. I will abstain, if I can—I say if I can, because I feel that even a simple narrative can be construed into invective. With regard to the general question of a disposition to peace or war, I for one declare, that I am as strongly and as sincerely for the preservation of peace as any man, and that I do not consider war as any remedy to the evils complained of. If a war spirit be springing up in this country, if a chivalrous disposition be observable, if a sentiment of indignation be rising upon the subject of the treatment of Switzerland, I for one shall contend that the treatment of Switzerland is no cause of war. I would therefore say, preserve peace if possible. Peace if possible; because the effects of war, always calamitous, may be calamitous indeed, buckling, as we should be forced to do, all our sinews and strength to that power in a contest with her upon such grounds. I repeat, therefore, peace if possible; but I add, resistance, prompt, resolute, determined resistance to the first aggression, be the consequences what they may. Influenced by these sentiments, I shall vote cordially and cheerfully for this large peace establishment; and it is because I shall vote for it that I think myself bound to state my reasons. Sir, some Gentlemen seem to consider what they advance as so many axioms too clear to need explanation, or to require defence. But when I vote so large an establishment, I think myself not at liberty to bind such a burden upon my constituents, without stating the grounds upon which I act, and the principles by which I am prompted. Sir, I have listened with all the attention I am master of, to the different arguments that have been advanced in the present debate. One Hon. Gentleman, who spoke second, appears to be a decided enemy to a great establishment; and the reasons he gave for his opposition, I confess, perfectly astonished me. He says, if Ministers had only said to him that danger existed, he would for one have voted for the force proposed. Does he doubt the danger? He complains that his Majesty's Ministers do not state it precisely. But does he pretend that he does not see and feel it? Can any one look at the map of Europe, and be blind to it? Can any one have a heart to resist apprehended injury, and say that we ought not to be prepared? But he asks, Why raise only 110,000 men? You can never equal the military power of France, and, as you cannot, why stop at 110,000? Why not raise 120, 130, or 140,000? If this argument be worth any thing, it applies equally to our raising only 1000. Why, if we can never be equal to France, raise a man? Another Gentleman, who spoke last, has alluded to alliances, and I agree perfectly with him in what he advanced against making any pledges. He has alluded to the fate of the pledges made in the War of the Succession, in the war of 1741; but if he meant to be impartial, he need not have gone back so far—he need not have travelled beyond the last war—he might have mentioned the pledges then given—he might have recollected the pledge of never giving up the Netherlands—he might have recalled to our minds the pledge of obtaining indemnity for the past, and security for the future—he might have dwelt upon the pledge of exhausting the last drop of our blood in the contest for religion, order, and civilized society—the toto certatum corpore regni—he might have reminded us of all these pledges made, and of all of them having been abandoned. He confesses his warmth of friendship for the late Minister, and he certainly never shewed it more than in stopping so short with his historical narrative of pledges. The next excellent reasoning of the Hon. Gentleman who spoke second, against the proposed vote, is, that the first year of war there will be an immense army drawn upon the opposite coast, and therefore now it is not necessary to be prepared. When the army is upon your shores, when the trumpet of the enemy sounds at your gates, then it is time to be prepared. Appearance of security, he contends, gives, often, the effect of security. If we have large armies, France will think we raise them through fear; if we do not have them, she will think that we feel ourselves perfectly secure. I have heard instances, Sir, where mounting wooden guns upon a fort has produced the same security as if there had been real ones. But unluckily in this instance for us, by our constitutional form of proceeding, our whole force must be known: we cannot pass upon an enemy wooden guns, and an army at Brentford. If we vote no force, an enemy will know we have none. But have no arms, throw away your guns, is the advice of the Hon. Gent. Sir, when every house in my neighbourhood has been attacked and robbed by a gang of ruffians, how my having no arms is to save me from a visit from them, I must leave the Hon. Gentleman to explain. His next argument is, that it is unreasonable in us to believe that Buonaparté wishes to be at war with us; for he thinks the French have nothing to gain by invasion. Nothing to gain? What else have they to lose but that of which it has been said they have so much to spare? and what have they not to gain? Sir, I cannot but think this as unbecoming a sentiment as ever was uttered. But it is unreasonable to think that the French wish to meddle with us. Why, I protest I cannot explain. If, as has been said, they have felt our arms, they who have been

every where else successful, cannot but view the only power whose arms they have felt, with feelings of warm resentment, and with sentiments of mortified pride. But look at the map of Europe; there, where a great man, who, however, was always wrong on this subject, said, he looked for France, and found nothing but a chasm. Look to that map now, and see nothing but France. It is in our power to measure her territory, to reckon her population; but it is scarcely within the grasp of any man's mind to measure the ambition of Buonaparté. Why, when all Europe bows down before him—why, when he has subdued the whole continent, he should feel such great respect for us, I am at a loss to discover. If then it be true, as I have stated, that his ambition is of that immeasurable nature, there are abundant and obvious reasons why it must be progressive—reasons much stronger than any that could have been used under the power of the Bourbons. They were ambitious, but it was not so necessary for them to feed their subjects with the spoils and plunder of war; they had the attachment of a long-established family applied to them; they had the effect and advantage of hereditary succession. But I see in the very situation and composition of the power of Buonaparté a physical necessity for him to go on in this barter with his subjects, and to promise to make them the masters of the world, if they will consent to be his slaves. I see then, I repeat, this strong reason for his pursuing this system of policy. If that be the case, must not his most anxious looks be directed to Great Britain? Every thing else is petty and contemptible compared with it. Russia, if not in his power, is at least in his influence—Prussia is at his beck—Italy is his vassal—Holland is in his grasp—Spain at his nod—Turkey in his toils—Portugal at his foot; when I see this, can I hesitate in stating my feelings, still less can I hesitate in giving a vote that shall put us upon our guard against the machinations and workings of such an ambition? But it has been said that it is possible he may mean nothing more than rivalry in commerce. Happy, Sir, shall I be if such an idea enter into his head at all, much more if it form part of his plans. But I confess I cannot see that it does. I mark him taking positions calculated to destroy our commerce, but I do not find him doing any thing for the mutual benefit of the trade of the two countries. I see him anxious to take possession of Louisiana, and to use the ports of St. Domingo to carry our West India and Jamaica trade. I can conceive a possible case, in which such positions might be taken as to force us to surrender our commerce without a stroke. An ignorant observer may see two armies, and may say there is no war, because there is no battle; yet one of them may make such movements as to compel the other to surrender without striking a blow. Of the commercial talents of Buonaparté I can be supposed to know but little; but bred in camps, it cannot be imagined that his commercial knowledge can be very great; and, indeed, if I am rightly informed, he is proceeding in the old plan of heavy duties and prohibitions. But he would go a shorter way to work with us. The old country has credit, and capital, and commercial enterprise; and he may think, if he can subjugate us, that he can carry them off to France like so many busts and marbles. But he would find himself mistaken; that credit would wither under the gripe of power; that capital would sink into the earth, if trodden upon by the foot of a despot; that commercial enterprise would, I believe, lose all its vigour in the presence of an arbitrary government. No, Sir, instead of putting his nation apprentice to commerce, he has other ideas in his head. My humble apprehension is, that, though in the tablet and volume of his mind there may be some marginal note about cashiering the King of Etruria; yet that the whole text is occupied with the destruction of this country. This is the first vision that breaks upon him through the gleam of the morning—this is his last prayer at night, to whatever deity he addresses it, whether to Jupiter or to Mahomet; to the Goddess of Battles, or to the Goddess of Reason. But, Sir, the only consolation is, that he is a great philosopher and philanthropist. I believe this hyper-philanthropy has done more harm than ever it did good. He has discovered that we all belong to the western family. Sir, I confess I feel a sentiment of deep indignation, when I hear that this scrap of nonsense was uttered to one of the most enlightened of the human race.—To this family party I do not wish to belong. He may invite persons if he please, to dinner, and, like Lord Peter, say, that this tough crust is excellent mutton. He may toss a sceptre to the King of Etruria to play with, and keep a rod to scourge him in the corner; he may have thought at first his Cisalpine republic a fine growing child, and may have found it a ricketty bantling; but I feel contempt for all this mockery. Let us, Sir, abstain from invective, only let us speak the truth. Why, Sir, what I have said, is nothing but the truth. Let us be visiting acquaintance, but I do implore him not to consider us as one of the family. Perhaps, Sir, it is unnecessary for me to state any more reasons for voting for this large peace establishment. All I desire is, not to have it understood that in stating my fears I speak from a well-informed judgment. On that account it is, that I say, Do not go to war; on that account it is that I state my apprehensions as rational grounds for great vigilance, and for strong preparation. Sir, there are two other points pressed by several Gentlemen, to which I beg leave to refer: I mean the fitness of the persons in power, and the spirit of the people. The power of the country consists in its army, its navy, and its finance, in the talent and integrity of its Ministers, and, above all, in the spirit of the people. Upon this second branch of the question, though I have said some things which may be considered as grateful to that party which may be denominated the war party, yet I fear I shall be compelled to state by and by some circumstances that may not be quite so agreeable to them. It is a matter of no importance to the House perhaps to know why I was absent on the first two days of the session. I was anxious to hear the part which men would take, and I do confess I never felt so much disgust at any circumstance as to find on the first day of the session, instead of an unanimous vote for vigilance and preparation, a call from some to give us back our places. The Noble Lord's friends may be divided into two classes—those who call for a change of Ministers, and for war. And here I must say, that I thank them for their frankness in stating what they have done, because their frankness is an antidote to the fury of their counsels. The Noble Lord says, We don't want to go to war; we only wish to have other persons in power; the Noble Lord deals with the ingenuousness of youth, as I say; with the inexperience of youth, according to others. But what should we get by this change? Would those persons he recommends have acted differently from the present Ministers? Would they have gone to war for any of the events that have occurred since the peace?—for the annexing of Piedmont to France?—for the Cisalpine republic?—for the invasion of Switzerland?—No, for none of these. They would have done as Ministers have done, but more vigorously—they would have shewn more grumbling patience—they would have made wry faces—they would not have stood with their hands before them—no, but with their arms a-kimbo. What would they have got by this? Would they have obtained any thing more by all this grudging and wincing? Would such a mode of conduct have become the character and dignity of the country? Sir, it is not to be inferred, because the Right Hon. Gentleman opposite me did none of these things, that he felt no indignation. I learn from his Majesty's speech, every word of which I approve, that his Ministers are determined not to be shut out of the continent. I say, Sir, I approve of the speech, because it satisfied me that a sense of wrong, and a resentment of injury, may live under moderate language. But these Ministers, it seems, are the incapable Gentlemen. Will Gentlemen shew us any act of base submission on their part? If they can; if they prove that they did any act with respect to Switzerland, and meanly retracted it afterwards, I will be the first to inveigh against them. But, these Gentlemen shew us no such acts; they seem as if they considered Ministers, now the drudgery of signing the peace is done, as functi officii, and as if they ought to go out; as if one was a mere goose-quill, and the other a stick of sealing-wax, which are done with, and ought to be thrown under the table. We know that Touchstone says, as a good ground of quarrel, "That he don't like the cut of a certain courtier's beard."

"Non amo te, Sabide, nec possum dicere quare ;

"Hoc tantum possum dicere, non amo te !—"

The English parody may be more applicable to these Gentlemen :

"I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,

"The reason why I cannot tell ;

"But this I'm sure, I know full well,

"I do not like thee, Dr. Fell "

It is fair, Sir, to say, that this English parody, so unfavourable to the Doctor, proceeds from the mouth of a fair lady, who has privileges to like and dislike, which would ill become a Member of this House. Sir, I contend that no solid reason has been offered to be urged against these Ministers. How, I would ask, has the Right Hon. Gentleman forfeited the confidence of the people? And why are we told that there is but one man alone that can save the country? But it seems, and I must frankly confess that I was utterly astonished when I heard such an assertion made use of, that his Majesty's Ministers assumed the reins of government at a most inviting period. Sir, I defy any man to shew me a period of greater difficulty. The Right Hon. Gentleman who, in the chair of this House, had so amply deserved and secured the respect of every Member in it, could not but have quitted it with feelings of regret. But the expeditions to the Baltic and to Egypt were prepared—true: yet was success certain? Was it not the act of chance, and the great skill shewn by the Noble Admiral (Nelson), that brought the expedition to the Baltic to a favourable issue? Did the late Ministers conceal their fears with respect to the expedition to Egypt? That it was most glorious in its event, and that the country ought to bind the brows of the meanest soldier engaged in it with laurels, I am ready to allow. But it cannot be denied that after the expedition had been off the coast of Italy, and was in Marmore Bay, orders were sent to stop the expedition altogether. With respect to the negotiations for peace, their predecessors knew that the present Ministers would have to deal with men who, it might be supposed, would be glad of an occasion to retort the insolence of Lord Grenville's letter. If the enemy had parodied that letter as their only answer to us, if they had said, We will wait for experience and the evidence of facts with respect to the new Ministry; if they had said, Restore that old Whig constitution, which the former Ministers have so impaired—we might have thought such conduct trifling, and beneath them; but we could not have questioned its fairness. Sir, though his Majesty's Ministers must have been prepared to expect humiliation; yet they made peace, I will venture to say, on terms comparatively more advantageous to the country than those that were offered at Lisle. Of these Ministers, Sir, I know also that they have not renewed any of their predecessors' oppressive acts—But this, some Gentlemen will contend, is a proof of their weakness and unfitness. Never too, Sir, did the Treasury interfere so little in the general election. This again may be advanced by some as an instance of their incapacity. Nay, the North was left almost to a Member of the late Administration. When, therefore, Gentlemen talk in future of Mr. Pitt's being the fittest person to save the country, they ought to add also the name of Mr. Dundas. But what did these Gentlemen expect from the present Chancellor of the Exchequer? We treated him, when in the chair of this House, with the respect he merited. He has, I believe, Sir, over our present worthy Speaker, the advantage in attitude; but did they expect that when he was Minister he was to stand up and call Europe to order? Was he to send Mr. Coleman, the Sergeant at Arms, to the Baltic, and order the Northern Powers to the bar of the House? Was he to see the powers of Germany scrambling like Members over the benches, and say, Gentlemen must take their places? Was he expected to cast his eye to Italy, and exclaim, that strangers must withdraw? Was he to stand across the Rhine, and say, The Germans to the right, and the French to the left? If he could have done all these things, I for one should always vote, that the Speaker of the House should be appointed the Minister of the country. But, the Right Hon. Gentleman has done all that a reasonable man could expect him to do. Sir, I confess I wish to know what Mr. Pitt himself thinks. I should be glad to hear what his sentiments are of the call made for him, and loudly made too in another place by a vigorous statesman. I well remember, Sir, and so do we all, the character he gave of the present Administration. The justice of his character of the First Lord of the Admiralty no man can question. Of the accuracy of his judgment with respect to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, it does not become us to entertain a doubt. The Noble Secretary of State was better qualified for the situation than any man in the country, with an exception made, I believe, in favour of my Hon. Friend near me (Mr. Fox). Does Mr. Pitt mean to retract that character? I cannot suppose he does. I must believe that he left in his judgment the best Administration that could be left. I have heard some Gentlemen attach to the present Ministry the appellation of a mawkish mixture; but if I were to compare them to any thing, I should say, that Mr. Pitt and the Ex-Secretary of War acted as men fond of wine (which I certainly do not mean to impute to them as a fault), and drinking a bottle of Tokay. Though you may take what appears to be the best, and leave only what seems to be the lees, yet if you only pour a bottle of good white wine upon them, you have as good a bottle of Tokay as ever. Sir, I think the mixture as good and as wholesome to the constitution as it could have been. I am sure I hear with joy that it is not on account of ill health that the Right Hon. Gentleman to whom I have alluded is absent. I repeat, Sir, when I see so many persons anxious about that Gentleman, I am glad to hear that his health is re-established. But how, I would ask, can we, with any consistency, turn out the man who made the peace, to bring in the person who avowed his approbation of it? Sir, it is since that peace was made that Gentlemen have voted a statue to Mr. Pitt; but whenever they erect that statue, let them cover it with laurels so as not to shew its nose; yet still a piece of the olive must go with it, for he approved and supported the peace. Sir, I cannot persuade myself to think he is playing a double game, or that he has retracted the opinion he has delivered in this House; but every thing should stand plain, every thing should be explicit. I have heard of one person playing two different games of chess for two different persons at the same time, but I never heard of a person playing one of his hands against the other. I suspect, therefore, there has been some mistake in the telegraphic communication—that the political Philidor's game has been misunderstood—that his friends have displaced a knight and a castle, when they should only have taken two pawns—that they have made an attempt to checkmate the king, when they had no instructions for doing it. Sir, I cannot forget the period when the august personage of the Sovereign was held up as the only man who was against extending privileges to the Catholics of Ireland; and I cannot, therefore, brook the idea of calling that Right Hon. Gentleman back to power, and forcing him upon the Crown. I expected when I came into this House to hear much said against Buonaparté, but I had not the slightest expectation of hearing any thing against the prerogative of the Crown. Mr. Pitt the only man to save the country! No single man can save a country. If a nation depends only upon one man, it cannot, and, I will add, it does not deserve to be saved: it can only be done by the Parliament and the people. Sir, I say, therefore, I cannot believe that there is a back and a fore door to this Egerian grotto. We have all heard, I dare say, of a classical exhibition in this town, the Invisible Girl. Here, however, I hope we shall have no whispering backwards and forwards, no speaking through tubes, no invisible agency. I hope too, that we shall have it declared, as it ought to be, that these opinions, which have been rumoured about, are unfounded. I shall now address a few words to those Gentlemen who would hurry us into war; and here, Sir, I must say, that, of all persons living, the Ex-Secretary of War is the last man who can consistently call out for war. He despised the warning voice of my Hon. Friend—he turned a deaf ear to his predictions, that we should only consolidate and strengthen the power of France. His answers always were as if he should despise the power of France, could he but see Jacobinism destroyed.—Is it not destroyed?

“Approach thou like the rugged Russian bear;
“The am’r rhinoceros, or the Hyrcan tiger—
“Take any shape but that, and my firm nerves
“Shall never tremble.”

The Right Hon. Gentleman's wishes are gratified; Jacobinism is killed and gone, and by whom? By him who can no longer be called the child and champion of Jacobinism: by Buonaparté. I remember to have heard Jacobinism compared to Antæus, who gained strength at every throw; but Buonaparté proceeded like Hercules; he gave it a true fraternal hug, and strangled it. Did the French annex Piedmont? did they enter Switzerland with the Rights of Man? did they talk of those rights when Buonaparté told the people of Italy they were a set of dolts and drivellers, and unfit to govern themselves? But now the Right Hon. Gentleman seems in a greater fright than ever. He seems as if he had rather have the old ghost back again. Most whimsically he wants to unite all parties against France—

“Black spirits and white,
“Blue spirits and gray,”

all are welcome to him. The moderate Jacobins he takes to his bosom; they were only misled by their feelings. The violent Jacobins he appeals to as men of proud spirits. He wishes to sing Ca Ira to them, and to head them all. But on what principle would they carry on the war? If they were able to curtail the power of Buonaparté, would not their views increase, and would they ever stop without making an example of the regicide republic? If they will speak out fairly, will they not confess this? Will the country, then, for such a purpose consent to turn out the present Ministers? Sir, upon the spirit of the country I wish to say a few words. I have heard from one Noble Lord, with regret, what I hope was but a slip, that the spirit of the country is worn out. I think the Noble Lord must retract that idea. Sir, I certainly looked to the rejoicings at the peace as an unmanly and irrational exultation. Do I rebuke the people for rejoicing at the blessings of peace? No, Sir, but for rejoicing without asking about the terms. Did they rejoice that we had gained Trinidad and Ceylon? Sir, one of the disadvantages attending the present Administration is, that they will not turn, when they are attacked by the last Administration. They are hampered by the votes they gave for the war. But from the period of the allegation that it was a war for the Scheldt, I assert that it continued to be a war upon false pretences. The people were told that it was a war for religion and good order, and they found that peace was ready to be made at Lisle, without any reference to those causes. The Right Hon. Gentleman says, What baseness, what meanness, while religion was in their mouths to consent to steal a sugar-island? It is true, Sir, though it comes a little extraordinarily from that man who was one of the Cabinet Ministers at the time of the negotiation at Lisle. It should appear as if there had indeed been great discord in the cabinet; there never was greater, says the Hon. Gentleman. They acted merely not like men in a boat, towing different ways, but like men in the boat of a balloon. Up the Ex-Secretary of War was ascending to the clouds, whilst Mr. Dundas was opening the valve and letting out the gas to descend—while one was throwing out ballast to mount to the most chivalrous heights, the other was attempting to let drop an anchor upon a West India island. Each of these Ministers was suffered to have his favourite plan. The Ex-Secretary at War was allowed to nibble at the court of France—the War Secretary of State to make a descent upon a sugar-island; and thus they went on till the letter from Lord Grenville, that letter never to be forgotten, and, I will add, never to be forgiven, made its appearance, and the people took a deep and settled disgust. Why did this not appear? and this, Sir, ought to be a lesson to us. The mouths of the people were shut and gagged, and the Government was acting without knowing any thing of their sentiments. Sir, in such circumstances, the integrity of their minds was disgusted, and they were glad to get rid of the war at any rate. Upon this subject I have dwelt the more particularly, because I wish Buonaparté not to mistake the cause of the joy of the people. He should know, that if he commits any act of aggression against them, they are ready to enter single into the contest, rather than suffer any attack upon their honour and their independence. I shall proceed no further. I perfectly agree with my Hon. Friend, that war ought to be avoided, though he does not agree with me on the means best calculated to produce that effect. From any opinion he may express, I never differ but with the greatest reluctance. For him my affection, my esteem, and my attachment, are unbounded, and they will end only with my life. But I think an important lesson is to be learnt from the arrogance of Buonaparté. He says he is an instrument in the hands of Providence, an envoy of God. He says he is an instrument in the hands of Providence to restore Switzerland to happiness, and to elevate Italy to splendour and importance. Sir, I think he is an instrument in the hands of Providence to make the English love their constitution the better; to cling to it with more fondness; to hang round it with truer tenderness. Every man feels when he returns from France that he is coming from a dungeon to enjoy the light and life of British independence. Sir, whatever abuses exist, we shall still look with pride and pleasure upon the substantial blessings we enjoy. If that aggression be made, my Hon. Friend will, I am sure, agree with me, that we ought to meet it with a spirit worthy of these islands; that we ought to meet it with a conviction of the truth of this assertion, that the country which has achieved such greatness, has no retreat in littleness; that if we could be content to abandon every thing, we should find no safety in poverty—no security in abject submission: finally, Sir, that we ought to meet it with a fixed determination to perish in the same grave with the honour and independence of the country."

Mr. CANNING said, that something had been said of Government votes and Opposition speeches, as a practice not only unusual but unfair. In the case of the Opposition to the late Administration, the body was marshalled, and opposition to the men and to their measures accompanied each other; but it did not follow that the contrary practice involved any inconsistency. It was preposterous to say that an approval of the measure implied an approval of the person proposing it, and upon that ground he rested the defence of himself and those who entertained the same sentiments with him. He thought that the House had reason to complain of the want of explanation. It was the more necessary because different views were given by different Gentlemen of our situation. According to one, we were to sit down in flowing felicity, mending each other's stockings; and according to another, instead of a navy and rearing a hardy race of sailors on board our ships, we were to rear them upon our canals and duck-ponds. He wished that the speech he had just heard had been made by any of the present Ministers; Ministers who had conceded without conciliating, who had missed opportunities of alliance, and courted opportunities of disgrace. He would not pretend to say what were the motives that induced them to accept their places; but when his Right Hon. Friend, then absent (Mr. Pitt), was attacked, he should be the most ungrateful and abandoned of men, if he did not support him with his best abilities. He never had, however, mentioned his name except when provoked by an attack. This was the case in the present session. He never had urged a wish for the return of his Right Hon. Friend to office, though he might have entertained it; but if he was driven to the point he must say, Away with the measures, and give us the men. It is not the harness but the horses who draw the carriage; and ever there was a time that required great abilities, it was the present. What made France? A man.—France had the elements of strength in herself, no doubt; but look to her situation at the time Buonaparté assumed the government, and compare it with her imp. sing at itude now. What has produced the mighty difference? The genius of a man. If pressed, then, he had no hesitation to acknowledge his wish for the return of his Right Hon. Friend to office. His Right Hon. Friend was incapable of playing so dishonourable a game as that to which the Hon. Member (Mr. Sheridan) alluded. No man was ever less likely to furnish, by his conduct, any grounds for such an imputation. Never did young ambition labour so much to attach popularity and power as his Right Hon. Friend had laboured for two years past to detach them. He had, in that period, laboured not for fame but for obscurity; but much as he had laboured, he could not succeed, for he could not withdraw himself from the notice of a people whom he had saved. Neither was there any ground for the imputation, that he keeps at a distance, and guides measures for which he is not responsible; but on this point he hoped Ministers would do him justice. Where there was no power there should be no responsibility, and where there was no responsibility there should be no power.

Mr. WILBERFORCE wished to consider the present question as one resting upon the confidence of Ministers. They were the best judges of its expediency, and were responsible for the public safety. At the same time he should give his assent with some unwillingness, from the apprehension that these 30,000 men would be looked to for our defence, instead of exciting the spirit and energies which would afford better means of safety. The country ought to have a strong government, that possesses the hearts of the people, and it has so. As such, it ought to be supported. An author says, the "Athenians know what is right, but the Lacedæmonians practise it." His Right Hon. Friend alluded to (Mr. Pitt) followed the example of the latter. Of all the acts of magnanimity which he had performed, the greatest was the support he had given to the present Administration. This was a circumstance that stamped his character for true greatness. Another circumstance also characterized him as one of those men whom Providence raises up for the government of a country. It was the declaration which he made of his sentiments, when he stated that if the object which he thought best was not practicable, then he should be content to adopt the next best; a declaration which shewed that whatever might be his private views and wishes, and whatever the pain he should feel to abandon them, these were circumstances which had no influence upon his conduct, and that he looked only to what was good for his country. He admitted, that he felt more anxiety in voting for an increase of the army than of the navy. A great army was, in its physical operation, a great evil, while a navy increased our resources; but, at present, an army was necessary, and we must support one.

Mr. Fox.—"At so late an hour, I should not have offered myself, were it not for the turn the debate has taken: and I therefore feel it a duty I owe not only to myself but to my constituents and my country, to say a few words. The Hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr.

Canning) has attempted to answer some part of what I said on a former occasion, by totally misrepresenting it; and that part of it which he does not misrepresent, he does not attempt to answer at all. Now this is rather wonderful, considering that the Right Hon. Gentleman is not deficient in abilities, and certainly not in readiness. He need not, therefore, have waited for the assistance of newspaper mistatements, or any other species of assistance, since he might have replied on the spot to that which he censures. He begins by saying that the power of France is now 'confessed' by me. 'Confessed' by me! And was it necessary that the Right Hon. Gentleman should now for the first time find out that this was 'confessed'? Did the Hon. Gentleman never hear me most distinctly charge it upon his friends, the late Ministry, that by their misconduct they contributed so much to the aggrandizement of France? But he complains that I have not proposed a remedy for the evil that is confessed. But has the Hon. Gentleman himself proposed any remedy? Some say, and that but few, Go to war. The Hon. Gentleman does not say so. Yet what remedy has been proposed, except the high tone and fine words on which so much reliance seems to be placed, I have not yet heard. It is not said that the conduct of France to Switzerland, in the German indemnities, and other articles of complaint against France, are singly grounds of a new war; nor is it said, that, taken together, they amount to a cause of war; for if they do, in the opinion of the Right Hon. Gentleman, why does he not state it as a specific charge against Ministers, that they do not advise his Majesty to declare war? If he does not think that we should go to war, where do he and I differ but in the efficacy of fine words and the high tone? If he does think war the remedy, I am ready to join again with him on that ground of argument. But let him speak out. One Hon. Gentleman said, that if there was a person in this country, the agent of France, he could not do better than by holding such and such language. He seemed to say, that he might have supposed that those who held that language must be the agents of France, if he did not find that language used by Mr. Banks, whom he cannot suspect of being an agent of France. I wish Gentlemen would speak out. Do they believe that I stand up here as the agent of France? Do they think me actuated by hatred against my own country, or bribed to betray its interests? I have been in Paris lately, on pursuits foreign to the House, though much connected with my private occupations. Would it be strange, think they, if going to Paris to read Barillon's Dispatches, and find out who were the pensioners of France in Charles and James's reign: Odso! no bad opportunity to get a pension for myself! If any think so, I shall not take the trouble to undeceive them; but if they do so, it is a more rational sort of charge than the common-place reproach, that I am the apologist of France. That kind of topic may do very well for those who use it, the places where it is used, and those it is intended to please: but I should expect something better here. The apologist of France! And is not this the reproach that is used in every war, the grounds of which are at all disputed? If this be a war not only with France, but with Russia, (perhaps that may be a case in which in a former war I did receive a bribe!) those who think that other countries are not so much in the wrong as to justify a war, must lay their account with being exposed to the hackneyed charge of being the apologists of enemies. Differing from those who are for large establishments, I hope it will not be expected that I should clear myself of a design to invite the French to invade this country. Now, as I have no opportunity of swearing that I do not intend to invite the French to invade this country, I hope Gentlemen will take it on my word. To come to the question of the establishment of the army, it may be considered, whether a small or great army be best suited to the defence of the country. I find it said, that, as formerly, alliances superseded the necessity of large establishments, now, having no alliances, we should have a large army. Now, I believe the argument in former times to have been directly the reverse. It was because we had connexions with the continent, and not for our own defence, that standing armies were proposed; and this the preamble of every mutiny bill, since K. William's reign, states. But how does the argument apply? What are the most glorious wars in which this country has been engaged for the last century? They are those that are called the War of Succession, and the Seven Years War. Now it is certain, that, previous to these wars, our peace establishment was lower than the peace establishment previous to other wars in which we were less successful. The peace establishment after the peace of Utrecht, a period of the longest cessation of war, was likewise very low. But it may be said, that the establishments of France were even proportionally low. If relative proportion be made the rule, it will not be easy to apply it satisfactorily. The truth is, that the power of France is different in its principle from the power of Great Britain, and hence arises a necessary variation in the principle of our offensive and defensive wars. It is not a ratio of 30, or 40, or 60,000 men, to any given number in France, that will enable us to judge when our establishment is adequate. An Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Banks) alluded to the establishment in 1763 and 1783. Of the latter, which out of doors was styled a scandalously low establishment, I, as one of the advisers of it, am willing to take the responsibility. It was mentioned by the Secretary at War, that then we had not Holland against us. But in fact, at the time of that establishment, Holland was as much in the hands of France as she is now. In effect, France, who had her colonies, made the peace for her; and under the influence of France, Holland remained till the events of 1787 overthrew it. We now come to the power of France—and really I am doubtful whether those who speak of that power in the most exaggerated terms, are not in fact speaking what is more agreeable and more useful to the French government, than those who talk of that power with greater moderation. I maintain that the government of France is less in a situation than formerly to make any attempt upon this country; if it be by invasions that we are to be menaced, and if it be against invasion that a high establishment is intended. If we consider the state of the French navy, compared with our own, we must see that for this species of attack there cannot, for several years at least, be any well-founded alarm. The acquisition of Switzerland has been insisted upon as shewing a hostile spirit. But is this the first time we knew that the government of France, past, as well as present, were actuated by ambition? But it is admitted, that the conduct of France to Switzerland, which touches the feelings of all so much, and of which no man can entertain a stronger sense than I do, does not form an aggression against this country. Why then should it be an argument for adding 20 or 30,000 men to our establishment? How is the danger of our situation, which my Hon. Friend, as well as others, laboured by admirable powers of declamation so much to exaggerate, increased by that measure? Is 20,000 men added to our expenses, a remedy against the French attack on Switzerland? Brave words are easily spoken, and prove no courage. "He did speak brave words in the preach," says Captain Fluellen, in Henry V. of Pistol, who imposed on the honest Welchman with fine words. But instead of augmenting our army now, might not, upon the old foundation of our army, as many more troops be added in a short space as any emergency might require? Is the danger of invasion to be feared? In 1779 and 1780 I was apprehensive of invasion, because the superiority by sea being then doubtful, the French having landed an army, might have been able to send reinforcements, and compel us to sustain a war upon English ground, though I have no doubt but the spirit and courage of the country might have finally prevailed. But now our superiority by sea is unquestionable, and must so continue for at least some time. The French then must evade our fleet. They might, perhaps, succeed in landing an army, and the possession of Belgium certainly gives new facilities. But then if an army were landed, all succour would be cut off, and the whole must be either taken or destroyed. When I hear it said that we know not what so desperate a people may do; in the first place, I do not see that the French do such desperate things. In all the last war, when they may be supposed as desperate as they ever were, they never did think seriously of an invasion. The expedition to Egypt was not a desperate enterprise—for till the glorious victory of Lord Nelson, the French thought they could cope with us in the Mediterranean. They would do mischief; but surely ten millions of men attached to the constitution, and all are so, would have shewn, that, whatever mischief they might do, they could not subject us. Those who choose to exaggerate the courage, strength, force, genius, or desperation of the French, cannot think there is any danger that we should finally be subjected by any force the French could steal over to this country. Do they really believe, as has been said to-day, that there is any danger of seeing the tri-coloured flag flying on the Tower of London? Is it possible that a people so numerous, however dastardly, could be subdued by 40,000 men—the greatest number that could be conveyed over to this country in the relative state of the navies of France and England? Indeed those who paint our situation and our prospects in the most gloomy colours, do not want good humour enough to enliven the canvass with many ludicrous touches—so that if they describe us as ruined, it is in the temper of the man in the play, who is told, ‘if you are an undone man, you really are the merriest undone man in Christendom.’ But an invasion, though it would neither destroy our laws, our government, nor our constitution, might do serious mischief, I confess. It would perhaps destroy or suspend that credit and that wealth, of which some Gentlemen speak so contemptuously, in comparison of guns and bayonets. But if we are not vulnerable by invasion of the soil of Great Britain, there are vulnerable points in our situation. Are we not vulnerable through our finances? Might not the French think that to harass this country by expensive establishments; to divert in useless and cumbrous forces the resources that might be employed in accelerating the extinction of the national debt, was no very unsuccessful way of carrying on war with us? It was lately said, that the greater part of the population of Ireland was disaffected; but, without ascribing great effects to the Union, nay, unless we suppose the Government outrageously bad, the people of Ireland must, in a few years, be much less disaffected than they now are. Thus a few years of peace and moderate establishment would enable us to throw off a considerable part of that debt, which in war was called the best ally of France; while peace would equally tend to fortify us in Ireland, a point where it is evident we now are vulnerable. Is not France then much more likely to direct her efforts against our finances than to invasion, in which, at any time, there is so little prospect of success, and in which, for some time, there can be no prospect of success at all? The funds, by the late war, fell from 97 to 47—50 per cent. They again have risen to 67; but supposing a new war to take place, what would be the consequence of the funds losing 50, or even 30 per cent. on the price of

67? Instead, however, of such a loss, if peace is preserved, and our resources, increased by economy, be applied to the extinction of the public debt, I am almost sure that the funds would again rise to 97. I have already remarked that the strength of France and England is different; their offensive and defensive systems are different. The credit of this country is a main spring of its greatness and of its wealth. In France there was no great deal of credit before the revolution, but the utter destruction of it by the war, and the events of the war, though it spread much misery through France, did not unnerve that country. It rather contributed to swell the armies of the republic, and to the conquests they made. In England the destruction of credit, though it would not be attended with the loss of the independence of the country, for we might still possess men and arms, yet it would spread infinite misery over the land. Let us therefore ward off from our finances and from our credit every danger; because, though not fatal to our existence, their overthrow would be fatal to our well-being. High establishments would form no security against the danger which has been held out to us. Wise economy is the resource from which we shall draw the means of defending ourselves against every danger. If we have 25,000 men less, we shall in return in a short time have 25,000,000*l.* more to apply to our defence, and to enable us to repel any aggression. Hitherto I have argued the question upon the ground that war was an event which we might expect in no very distant period. But I do not think that we are obliged to anticipate a speedy war. I must declare it to be my opinion, that it is for the interest of the French nation, of the French government, that it is their wish to cultivate peace, and that with good management, without any particle of submission, peace may be preserved. The question of the navy establishment has been mixed with the consideration of the army; and I think strangely. It seems to be taken as a matter of course, that you must have a large army because you have 30,000 seamen. Now it appears to me, that the conclusion should be directly the reverse. It operates two ways. You need employ fewer soldiers for your defence, because you have augmented your navy; and the additional expense by sea, is an argument for additional economy in the establishment of land forces. There is a way, too, in which a large army establishment may be raised; and it is hitherto unnoticed. Is there no constitutional consideration arising from a large standing army? A standing army without consent of Parliament is illegal; with the approbation of Parliament it may still be dangerous. I do not mean to say that the officers of the army are not friends to the constitution of their country. But consider the source of influence which the army affords; there is scarce a Gentleman in this House, but by himself, or some relation, has some to look to in the army. I do not say, that this influence is pushed to carry a particular vote; but its effects in procuring a general support to the measures of Administration are obvious. I would not, however, exclude officers of the army from sitting in Parliament: that would render the evil worse, because it would too much separate the character of soldier and citizen. How is an army to be viewed, as soldiers distinct, or as citizens forming a part of the country? In the one case they may have no sympathies with the people; in the other, they may in the exercise of civil privileges give a dangerous preponderance (in an election, for instance) to any side they might espouse; but in fact they are to many purposes already, and wisely so, put under a control different from their fellow-subjects. To these remarks, however, the naval establishment is not subject, and for that reason I agree with the Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wilberforce), that the naval establishment is on that account less liable to objection, while it affords us all the security we can have against the danger, magnified as it has been. There is another view of the subject which, though not avowed, is perhaps entertained by some. It may be thought right to have a large establishment, in order to go to war immediately, or very soon; certainly, if we were to go to war in a month or two, it would be idle to reduce our establishment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, if I rightly understood, said a few nights ago, that he saw no danger to the peace of Europe at present; and the Secretary at War to-day spoke out distinctly, candidly, and laudably. He said it was our business to be armed against any danger. He and I differ as to the extent to which we should be armed; but he says, that we should provoke no war, that we should commit no aggression, that we should execute the treaty of Amiens, and that we should repel any insult or aggression with firmness and dignity. This is my creed. Is it probable, then, that the aggression may come from France? My Right Hon. Friend (General Maitland) gave a very ugly reason why the peace should be agreeable to the late Secretary at War, because the spirit of the country was become warlike; whereas if the war had continued, the table would have been loaded with petitions against it. This is rather a suspicious argument, because it seems to say, that we have only got rid of the bad war which could not be continued, in order to get another more acceptable. My Hon. Friend himself, I am sure, rejoices in the peace, and does not wish to begin the war on a new score. But in fact every thing convinces me, more and more, that the people are decidedly for peace. Gentlemen, however brave and warlike in their language, always conclude with saying, 'Nevertheless I am for peace!' They naturally wish to stand well with their constituents, and they do not fail to utter a sentiment they know will be agreeable to them. Much has been said of the tone we ought to assume; but what is the object to which all this tends?—My Hon. Friend (Mr. Sheridan) with much humour alluded to those who, with their arms across or their arms a-kimbo, would sit stock still, notwithstanding all their complaints against France. Now whether my Hon. Friend could sit stock still, with his arms across or his arms a-kimbo, I cannot tell:—he does little more than leave the tongue at liberty, and recommends you to acquiesce in peace, after a bluster at proceedings with which we are not to interfere. It has been said, indeed, that a remonstrance has been presented respecting the attack on Switzerland. I know not whether in the precise circumstances or manner of that remonstrance it was proper, though I have no reason to believe that it was not. Remonstrances may be presented in cases where no war is deemed expedient, even if the remonstrance be ineffectual. This happened in the case of Corsica in the year 1769. As to philippics, sure we must have philippics to keep up the national spirit. I am very willing that they be taken into account as provision for our security, but I hope that 30,000 men will in lieu of them be deducted from our establishments. But if we are to have the 30,000 into the bargain, I do not see what benefit they will produce. If danger really did appear; if invasion actually were effected, every feeling would be absorbed in those of repelling the invader, from the sovereign motive of self-defence; so that all the declamation which was to nourish the spirit of the nation would be fruitless and unnecessary."

Mr. WINDHAM in a long speech animadverted on Mr. Fox's argument; and said that ever since the commencement of the French revolution all his Anti-gallican opinions had been changed. He was not merely an apologist, but an economist of the French system, and saw neither mischief nor danger in their conduct. In 1787 he was an advocate for measures to preserve the balance of power, which was, in other words, that he was an advocate for interfering in the concerns of other powers. Then he saw danger arising out of the inordinate ambition of France; now he saw nothing to call for an increase of our establishment; but every thing was to lean to the side of our finances.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, he would have thought a much higher establishment than ever we had heretofore necessary, if the war had even left France without having increased the limits of her territory; but increased as she was by the addition of the Austrian Netherlands, and by the influence which she had in Holland and Spain, as well as elsewhere, he should be insensible to his duty if he did not recommend a high establishment. Nor should he treat the Committee with candour if he did not say that circumstances had occurred in Europe since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, which rendered a high establishment indispensable to our security. He had the most sacred regard to constitutional considerations. They were only exceeded, in his mind, by considerations of our safety. In the structure of the army, however, every attention had been paid by his Royal Highness to prevent the increase of influence. No more officers were to be provided for corps of 750 than were before for regiments of little more than half that number: so that the whole addition was effective force; and his Royal Highness had, with his usual spirit of national economy and attention to military claims, appointed no new officers, but had brought them in every instance from the half-pay, by which a very great saving had been made. He had also much pleasure in informing the Committee, that, if the revenue should continue as prosperous as it had been for the two or three last quarters, it would provide for an establishment very little short of that which was proposed this day.—He concluded with replying to the observation of Mr. Canning as to Mr. Pitt, that that Right Hon. Gentleman would not thank him, or any man, for vindicating him from an imputation so unworthy of him; or that he would shrink from the responsibility of measures which he in secret advised. His opinion, regard, and friendship, were unabated; but he should in future abstain from answering any observations of this kind made on the Right Hon. Gentleman in his absence.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, DECEMBER 9TH, 1802.

Mr. ALEXANDER brought up the Report of the Committee of Supply; and on the question being put from the Chair, that the Resolutions be read,

Mr. T. GRENVILLE rose, and prefaced the observations which he intended to make with assuring the House, that after the late hour to which the discussion was last night protracted, and knowing, as he did, the unwillingness of the House to enter on any thing like an adjourned debate, he should not trespass long upon their patience. He felt that he owed to himself to take the earliest opportunity of explaining to the House the opinion which he entertained of the business now before them. Those who heard what he had advanced when the navy estimates were under consideration, he hoped would now recollect what were the grounds which he urged on that occasion. His assertion then was, the House had passed that vote with less information to guide them in the propriety of passing it, than ever was before submitted to Parliament on similar occasions. The answer given then to this observation by a Noble Lord (Hawkesbury) surprised him not a little; for that Noble Lord confidently asserted that there was nothing in the history of Parliament respecting the granting of the information required, that made the late proceedings of the House differ from those of former times. Till now he had no opportunity of hearing or answering these contradictions; but as the same objections forcibly applied to the business of yesterday, and to that now before the House, he would endeavour briefly to restate his objections. What is our situation, and what lights have we to enable us to judge of it? If we call for those lights, we are referred to the speeches of Ministers, which convey no information; and though they did, are such speeches, weighty and important as they may justly be deemed, as coming from persons in the highest authority, fit parliamentary documents to enable and justify the House in coming to a decision on matters of the gravest moment? Far different evidence should be adduced when the estimates and supply are to be determined upon; and if the House does not procure that evidence and those lights, they widely depart from the ancient and usual mode of parliamentary proceeding. He might firmly maintain that no one instance has occurred in the parliamentary history of the country, in which Ministers have come down after the signing of a definitive treaty of peace to call for supplies or large establishments, without having advised his Majesty to make some communication from the Throne, intimating the probability that the peace would be lasting, or that it might be precarious, or if any dangers of a fresh rupture existed, without alluding to, or even going into some detail of those dangers. He might challenge the industry of the Gentlemen opposite him to produce a single instance to prove that the contrary was the usual practice of Parliament. A transient glance at the Journals would suffice to prove his assertion. The Hon. Gentleman then appealed to several speeches and messages recorded in the Journals, in corroboration of what he had advanced, but referred, particularly as a specimen of the practice of the Constitution, to one made to the House in 1714 by George I. He would refer them also to the years 1748, 1763, and even so late as to the year 1783; upon all which occasions communications were made from the Crown, delivering some opinion, more or less detailed, respecting the nature of the peace concluded, and the probability of what were likely to be its consequences. The notoriety of a fact did not form a proper parliamentary ground of proceeding. Parliament should have real, solid, substantial documents before them to judge by. The security of Parliament required it. They should look for communications from the Throne as the surest document, because they enabled them to form a proper judgment of affairs, and moreover gave them a pledge from Ministers, by which their subsequent conduct, and the nature of the system they pursued, might be fairly discussed and scrutinized. The want of such a document on the present occasion appeared to him to be a material objection, and a departure from the usual practice, dangerous to the essence of the Constitution. All the information Ministers now indulge the House with is confined to some general expression of force, vigour of preparation, &c. which should not satisfy Parliament. Should not the House know what garrisons are to be supplied by the sums now to be voted? It is true that Malta has not yet been evacuated; it is equally known that orders have been sent out to retain the Cape of Good Hope, in case of its not having been surrendered before these orders arrived. These were two considerable military points, and their fate should be known before an accurate judgment could be formed of the extent of the supply necessary. Questions respecting the fate of these places have been frequently put to Ministers, but as yet they have drawn no satisfactory answer from them. The Hon. Gentleman next proceeded to observe on the manner on which the business of the army estimates was yesterday opened by the Secretary at War. Nothing could be more clear, explicit, and manly than that opening: yet at the conclusion of his speech there were some expressions that called for particular attention, and which did not tally altogether with his opinion. The expressions he alluded to were these:—The object of Government in proposing to vote the present force, has two purposes in view, viz. to repel national insult and hostile aggression. He did not object to this use of the force. What he disliked was, that these expressions narrowed too much the use and effect which might be otherwise expected from it. Were we to vote 130,000 men merely for the purpose of sitting still till the French armies had actually invaded us? Too many of those who spoke on this subject seemed indeed to be of that opinion. Such, however, has rarely been the mode of arguing adopted by that House, nor could he well believe that the force now proposed would be limited to the sole and simple purpose of resisting the invasion of the enemy—(a cry of Hear! hear! from the Treasury Bench).—The Hon. Gentleman professed himself happy in hearing that expression of approbation, as it led him to imagine that he had been taking too confined a view of the intentions of Ministers. He rejoiced to hear that their declarations were susceptible of a larger latitude. He hoped, therefore, they would avail themselves of the force placed at their disposal, to speak a language to Europe, but more particularly to France, which should have its due weight and impression. The present government of France, if such language was held out to them, would see and feel the necessity of avoiding what might be fatal to them; but to forbear holding a firm and determined language, was only inviting and encouraging the First Consul to persist in his present wild career of conquest and aggrandizement. He also felt much struck with the language held out late upon the subject of continental alliances. Were it the intention of Government to look for any alliance with any great power on the continent, it was no doubt their duty to examine how far such a power might be able or willing to co-operate with us effectually; and when the continental powers observed that we intended to concentrate the whole of our force within the precincts of our own island, and merely for our own defence, what great encouragement could they feel to form an alliance with us? But his surprise was raised to an extraordinary degree indeed, when he observed a man (Mr. Fox) whose abilities he so much revered, and whose opinion must always have so much weight in the country, broach doctrines so novel on this topic, and so very inconsistent with his former sentiments. It was with reluctance, especially in his absence, that he now adverted to different expressions which had lately fallen from that Hon. Gentleman; but some of them were of a nature to be noticed without delay. When the fate of the King of Sardinia was introduced into a late debate, this Hon. Gentleman asked, whose fault it was that the King of Sardinia was not restored? Was it the fault of France? No; it was the fault of Austria, that opposed his restoration, lest it should be purchased at the expense of her Venetian territories. That such an assertion has any foundation he could never bring himself to believe. Did Venice belong to Sardinia? or rather, may not this be a story told to the Hon. Gentleman by the French Secretary of State in the Foreign Department? Talleyrand may have hinted that France would have given Piedmont to the King of Sardinia, if Austria would consent to cede Venice. But the Hon. Gentleman is pleased to ascribe the arguments urged by him and his friends to interested motives—that it is an object with them to renew the war. One of his Hon. Friends (Mr. Windham) is even accused of preferring war to peace, though that charge he has most solemnly denied. The next charge is brought against a Noble Relation of his (Lord Temple); the inadvertence, or the ingenuousness of his youth is said to have betrayed the secret we had in view, viz. to remove the present Administration. Could that be looked upon as a secret but by those who were scarcely ever present to hear the arguments upon which our views and opinions were grounded? But this charge is followed up by another—that partiality for the character and principles of a Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Pitt) prompts him to wish and endeavour to place that Right Hon. Gentleman at the head of affairs. To this charge he was ready to answer, Habes confitentem reum. Indeed it was his conscientious belief, that, if the country were to be canvassed from one end to the other, 99 out of 100 would be found of the same opinion. For to the talents, the love of the Constitution, the splendour of character, the integrity of principle, which distinguish that great man, those 99 out of 100 look for the preservation of a country which the vigour of his abilities has already rescued from ruin. Were that great majority of the country to see him now placed at the helm, their apprehensions would soon vanish, and a new life, spirit, and vigour be infused into the nation. But the Hon. Gentleman accuses him and his friends of also wishing to get into place; he could only say that this was an insinuation unworthy of a mind so exalted, and he only wished for the strong language so often used by that Hon. Gentleman when accused of similar views, in order to be enabled to repel the insinuation with effect. A still stronger insinuation has even been hazarded elsewhere, he could not say by whom, viz. that he and his friends wished to replunge the country into war, in order to promote their own schemes of ambition. On such an insinuation he should only observe, that the man whose heart could conceive, or whose lips could utter a calumny so base and foul, could alone, in his opinion, be capable of harbouring such flagitious and profligate projects.

LORD HAWKESBURY said, the Right Hon. Gentleman had commenced his speech with the same attack that had often been made upon the King's Ministers, and which had constantly been answered, as often as it had been advanced, viz. that they had not brought the situation of the country fully before the House; that they had not explained that situation in the manner which they ought to have done; and that Parliament were called upon, without sufficient ground, to vote the naval and military establishments of the year. But he contended, on the other hand, that every part of the conduct of Government had fully explained the system which Government had adopted, as far as had been usual with regard to foreign affairs. The Right Hon. Gentleman might say, that he had heard of discussions between this country and France, the result of which had not been explained to him. He would undertake to say, that it was not consistent with the general practice of Parliament and of the Constitution, to bring the details of such discussions before Parliament, unless Ministers called for some vote or opinion of Parliament founded upon those details. He knew that it had been maintained, that even when a general case had been made by Ministers, without the production of the details, they had a right to call for the support and confidence of Parliament.—This was the case at the period of the Russian armament, and it was afterwards said, on the other side of the House, that while the question was in discussion they had not inquired, but that when Ministers called for a direct vote, they had a right to give the House full information upon the subject. He did not mean to contend that it was not competent for any Gentleman to move for such information, if he could state sufficient grounds for its production; he meant only to justify Ministers in the line of conduct they had adopted. With respect to the general system adopted by Ministers, it had been insinuated and asserted, that it was impossible to understand what that system was, as if Ministers had never explained themselves upon the general principle of their conduct to France and other powers. He ought, perhaps, upon this subject, to refer to authentic documents, such as the Speeches from the Throne, and the Addresses of that House; but from the nature of those records, and from the manner in which they were necessarily constructed, they must be taken subject to the explanation of his Majesty's confidential servants.—It must be obvious to every Gentleman, that it was impossible, in a speech or message from the Throne, to enter into such a minute detail as would be necessary for the full explanation of the subject; but he admitted, that in those documents the general principle of the measure proposed ought always to be found. He was ready to contend, that it was impossible to conceive (as far as the circumstance would admit) a more complete explanation of the system which Government had adopted, than was to be found in an amendment which he had moved to an address proposed last session by an Hon. Friend of his. He wished to ask any Gentleman the meaning he would put upon the words of that amendment. It contained two propositions, which he did not mean to say could be separated entirely, but which were, however, in some degree distinct. The Right Hon. Gentleman complained that Ministers had not explained whether they would interfere with the continental powers; his answer was, that that point was completely explained in the amendment he had read. He begged shortly to call the attention of the House to the late treaty, and to the address to which he had alluded. When other treaties of peace were concluded, this country negotiated for peace in conjunction with other powers; but when the late treaty was concluded, every power on the continent had been induced or compelled to make separate treaties of peace. We were by those circumstances insulated, and forced to make a separate peace, unconnected with any of the continental powers. His Majesty's Ministers rested the defence of that treaty upon the circumstances under which it had been proposed and concluded. They stated the line of conduct they had adopted in consequence of the unfortunate events which had happened on the continent; but they at the same time stated, that, so far from abandoning all continental connexions, it must always form a part of the system of this country. If he was asked for the application of that principle, his answer would be, that the application of it must depend upon circumstances and events; they had therefore engrafted that principle into the address to which he had alluded. That address, therefore, contained the system which the King's Ministers had adopted, viz. that they would defend our own empire against all encroachments, and look with vigilance to the state of the continent. They had not attempted to define minutely what that line of conduct would be, because it must always be governed by circumstances. If this record wanted any confirmation, he might refer to the King's speech at the opening of the present sessions of Parliament. This speech, he contended, was in every particular conformable to the address to which he had before alluded; it maintained the same principles, and held the same language. As far, therefore, as language went, the system of the King's government had been explicitly avowed. The Right Hon. Gentleman might assert, that Ministers had not acted upon that system, that they had gone beyond, or had fallen short of it. Such a charge was perfectly open to the Right Hon. Gentleman to make, if he could substantiate it; but he had no right to say that Ministers had not laid down any system, and that they had not avowed it. He should have thought, that upon the general principle of continental alliances it was almost unnecessary for him to make any profession. Whenever he spoke upon this subject, he uniformly maintained one opinion. It was a subject which had very early occupied his attention, and upon which he had given his opinion the first time he had the honour of speaking in that House. He recollected that upon that occasion a Right Hon. Friend of his had made a most able and ingenious speech, which contained the best case he had ever heard against the balance of power. But certainly that principle, like all others, might be pushed to an extreme. It appeared to him that it was one of those questions upon which there was great danger of our over-refining; and he thought it was the duty of Government to guard against the extremes which a degree of over-refinement might sometimes occasion. That the interests of this country were not materially connected with those of the continent, or that we could exclude ourselves wholly, or even in a great degree, from all continental connexions, it would, in his opinion, be absurd to contend. Our commerce, our wealth, our importance in the eyes of Europe, were such, that we could not pretend to say that we would entirely insulate ourselves. He knew it had been said upon this subject, that all continental connexions were in their nature dissoluble. This proposition was undoubtedly true; but was the consequence that was to be inferred from it, viz. that no human work was in its nature perfect, and that continental alliances, because they were liable to dissolution, ought never to be entered into? That those alliances often contained in themselves the seeds of dissolution, was true; but the question was, whether, with all their defects, we were better with or without them? This was the only practical way of considering the subject.

If he looked into the examples contained in history upon this point, he was compelled to draw a very different inference from that which had been drawn by an Hon. Friend of his (Mr. Canning) on a former occasion. It had been asserted, that we had often been involved in wars by continental alliances; but it remained to be proved, that any of the wars in which we had been engaged had arisen from these alliances. The fact was directly the reverse. In no war which we had undertaken since the Revolution, had we engaged in it in consequence of continental alliances. It might perhaps be said, that we entered into the late war in consequence of an engagement with Holland respecting the opening of the Scheldt; but it must be admitted, that that only formed a part of the general question. He therefore thought it important, that we should not suffer ourselves to be carried away by any general cry that might be raised upon the subject, without ascertaining the facts. But there was another point to consider, and that was a material one. He wished the House to recollect in what wars we had continental connexions, and in what wars we had not, and to compare the result. The only war in which we had been engaged since the Revolution, in which we had not had any continental alliances was the American war, and that was the only war in which we were not successful. It was true, that in other wars we had sometimes failed, as far as they related to continental objects; but as far as British interests were concerned, we had been constantly successful, except only in the case of the American war. With this view of the subject, he was not disposed to renounce the opinion he had formerly entertained upon it; at the same time he was ready to admit, that there ought to be great prudence used in entering into continental alliances, not only with respect to the connexions themselves, but to the engagements we entered into. We ought not to enter into engagements so loose and so generally worded, as might, in the application of them, defeat their own object; and he also thought, that care ought to be taken not to pledge the country too deeply, because circumstances were frequently liable to change. He had no difficulty in saying, that he should not think he should do his duty, if, maintaining the general principle, he should not endeavour to give it effect whenever he was able, according to circumstances, circumscribed by prudence and wisdom. Insinuations had been thrown out, that this country had met with nothing but treachery and breach of faith from our allies, and that assertion had been particularly exemplified in the case of Austria. If we were to look at that country throughout the whole course of the war, there were periods when that power not only displayed the most inflexible fidelity to her engagements, but the most heroic resolution. She did not conclude the treaties of Leoben or Luneville, till the very last extremity, and when she was presented by the pressure and urgency of circumstances from sending a minister for the purpose of obtaining our consent, which consent, if she had asked, we could not for a moment have refused. Before the conclusion of the last treaty, she shewed a degree of fidelity to her engagements with us that never was surpassed; for after the battle of Marengo, she was strongly and repeatedly urged by France to conclude a separate treaty, and terms were offered much more favourable than she afterward obtained. Notwithstanding every effort on the part of France, Austria would not make peace till she was compelled by the fatal battle of Hohenlinden. All he had, therefore, to beg of Gentlemen was, that when they spoke upon these subjects, they would do it after some consideration, and not endeavour to make impressions in which they knew they were not warranted by the facts. He confessed that he felt such regard for antiquity, that, when he found that the best and wisest men for centuries had agreed in opinion with respect to the policy of such alliances, he should require very strong reasons, and a great deal of experience, before he would venture to say they were mistaken. An Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fox) seemed to think that no change which had taken place in the situation of Europe required an increase in our establishment. It could not be denied that the great extent of coast which France had now obtained, the number of harbours which she had acquired, must make a great difference in our relative situation. It had been said, that the House of Bourbon were actuated by the same motives of ambition with the revolutionary governments of France, and were as much disposed to violate treaties as any government whatever. This was true to a certain extent, and he was as ready as any man to condemn this part of the policy of the House of Bourbon. But it was necessary to consider not only their will, but their power to do mischief. The present government of France had the power of doing things which the House of Bourbon, whatever its disposition might be, had not the means to accomplish. A great deal had been said, at different times, about persons looking only at measures and not at men; he confessed he was very much inclined to consider this as mere cant and hypocrisy, or at least as proceeding from ignorance. In one sense, and to a certain degree, they must go together. If any Gentleman brought a charge against Ministers, it was absurd to suppose that a man could condemn measures, and not wish to remove the men by whom they were adopted. If that House were to agree in a resolution to censure the conduct of the King's Ministers, it ought to be followed up with a motion for the removal of those Ministers. Nothing, in his opinion, could be more absurd than to suppose, that the system of Ministers could be disapproved of, and yet that they ought to be kept in office, in hopes that they would

adopt a line of conduct contrary to that of which they were known to approve. But this principle had been pushed a little farther, and to an extent to which he could not assent. If a Gentleman said he disapproved of the measures of Administration, and therefore he would, if possible, remove the Ministers, he could understand him; it was fair, constitutional language. The right of that House to address his Majesty to remove his Ministers, on proper grounds, was incontestable; but to suppose that the House had a right to remove Ministers without assigning any public ground whatever, was inconsistent with every principle of the constitution. It would take from the Crown the right of choosing its own servants, and make the office of Minister the subject of personal canvass. It is true, that in 1784 there was an address to remove Ministers, without any charge against their public conduct; but even in that case there was an allegation of their having come improperly into office, though that was found by no means to be the public opinion. He wished merely to be tried by his public conduct; and he could answer for himself, and he believed for his colleagues in office, that if Parliament disapproved of their measures, they would not wish to continue one moment longer in office. If their measures were not found to be consistent with the honour and interests of the country, they would not attempt to set up prerogative against privilege, in any case where the exercise of the latter was really constitutional. If the King had the nomination of his Ministers, Parliament ought to control them, to watch over them, and to examine their measures; and upon this principle the safety of the constitution depended. He hoped that Parliament would always endeavour to preserve to the Crown its proper place in the constitution, while they maintained their own privileges; and to the opinion of Parliament his Majesty's Ministers would always submit themselves whenever it was expressed.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT.—“Sir, a more important question than the present never came before Parliament. It is, whether you will agree to a peace establishment unprecedented in force, but alleged to be rendered necessary by unprecedented circumstances. An Hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. Grenville) has observed, that the forms of the House have been neglected by not giving any communication from the Throne upon the subject in question. I think the objection is founded in good sense, and I agree with him. He also says, that we should cherish continental connexions; and the answer given to him is not, that we should have no continental connexions, but that we should not be eager to make ourselves principals, which amounts to nearly the same thing. Now my objection to these connexions for maintaining the balance of power, is the opportunity which they afford Ministers to involve the country in wars without adequate cause or necessity. With regard, Sir, to the Right Hon. Gentleman who has been so much alluded to (Mr. Pitt), I shall say a few words. The country has been stated, by the admirers of that Right Hon. Gentleman, to be in the most gloomy and alarming situation. I agree that it is so; but when I think that the country has been brought into that situation by that Right Hon. Gentleman and his friends, I am extremely surprised at their conduct. They may say in their defence, that though they agreed on the means, they might have differed upon one point; but when I find that one point the principal, I leave them to reconcile their argument with their consistency. Now, Sir, with respect to the question of a large peace establishment: I admit that it is stated as a choice of evils, but it is a measure that becomes the more important because it is not a single one, but part of a system. If it came unaccompanied with barracks, and other sources of influence, it would be less objectionable; but that cannot be, as these are the necessary consequence. When I look to your pension lists, which are kept full, and to the dock-yards, from which men are every day discharged and thrown upon the world, unable to earn their bread, I cannot think but this is to begin economy at the wrong end. When I read of fortunes being settled on noblemen's daughters, pensions settled on ministerial clerks' wives; and when I think of the late general distress, and of the many poor now destitute, an Englishman's eye must ache to look over these pension lists. I cannot, Sir, conceive a situation more perilous than the present, and do think it one in which something more is necessary than a strong peace establishment."

Mr. H. BROWNE said, that when the Hon. Baronet took notice of the gloomy state of this country, and censured the late Administration as the cause of it, it did not occur to him to tell the House in what other country there was more general comfort for mankind. Did he think it was in Spain? Did he think it was in Italy? Did he think it was in the Netherlands? Did he think it was in Holland? Did he think it was in Switzerland? Did he think it was any where in Europe? Or did he know one spot on the face of the globe in which there was more general comfort to mankind than there was in England at this hour? Or would he point out to the House the spot which he would wish Great Britain to resemble? and then, when that question was determined, perhaps the other, on the true character of the late Administration, would not be difficult: for in discussing that matter, the question would not be, what we might have now of difficulty remaining, but what evils and horrors had we avoided, and for the avoiding which we were indebted very much indeed to the late Administration? The people of England, he believed, felt none of the indignation against the late Ministers which the Hon. Baronet apprehended; the people of England felt that they had a constitution, for the preservation of which they had not forgotten to whom they were so much indebted; nor did he believe they needed much persuasion to be convinced, that the measure now proposed was a measure for their general welfare; upon a conviction of which, he did not believe there would appear in them any deficiency of spirit, the more especially, when the excellent speech of the Secretary at War yesterday in that House came to be circulated over the country, which assuredly it would. The people of England were a commercial people, and therefore naturally loved peace; but they were likewise a warlike people, and knew how to act in war, if war became necessary. They were always true to others, and could be true to themselves. He did not mean to vote this force for the purposes of aggression, but in our own defence: it was not for invasion only that we were to be in readiness, but we must be ready to resist every infraction of the treaty of Amiens, or any danger to our own safety. With regard to what had been said on the subject of measures and men, he could not conceive how, in a political question, they could be separated. Had any Minister come to the House without any circumstances to justify it, and called for such a force as this, he should not have voted for it; but there was enough in the conduct of the Chief Consul of France to answer every thing on that head. He was pleased, however, to see in the conduct of Ministers, and in their language, every thing that led to the continuance of peace. He justified the peace of Amiens, on the ground, that, when it was concluded, things were in such a condition that nothing could be gained by the war; and as to Great Britain, not the least derogation of her dignity appeared on that event—on the contrary, it was highly to her honour. It was true, indeed, that at that period the situation of Europe was much to be lamented, but that arose from no fault in Great Britain. With regard to the capacity of his Majesty's Ministers, he thought that their having been able to conduct the business of Copenhagen, and every thing which related to the complicated concerns embraced by the treaty of Amiens, their being able to satisfy the whole body of the House of Commons, with the exception of a few individuals, by their speeches in that House; he owned these things put together appeared to him to give evidence of very great capacity. He concurred in this vote, not for the purpose of meeting war, but to preserve the honour of this country, and to maintain peace.

Dr. LAURENCE, in a speech of considerable length, condemned the system upon which Ministers acted; particularly in reducing the navy so much since the peace, and proposing to keep up a large standing army, though the former force was our natural defence, and the latter was ever an object of constitutional jealousy. He animadverted on the observations of the Noble Secretary of State, in this debate, on the subject of continental alliances and the balance of power, and compared them with his assertion on a former occasion (the Russian armament), that the capture of Oczakow, a fortress on the Black Sea, by the Russians, would endanger the safety of Europe. He reprobated the idea of abandoning that policy, with respect to the continent, upon which this country had acted for the last century and a half. He also reproved the practice of perpetually referring to the conduct of Ministers during the last war: of that practice the Hon. Baronet (Sir F. Burdett) and his friends appeared too fond. The House should not be so goaded. If Gentlemen wished to investigate that conduct fully, let it be brought forward in a grave and proper form, and solemnly discussed. Let it be contested, fact to fact, and point to point. Let the question be at once set at rest; for he was persuaded that while these allusions continued, the regular progress of debate would be interrupted, and there would be nothing but divisions and distractions in the House.—The Hon. and Learned Member expressed an anxious desire to have an explanation of what ideas were meant to be attached to national insults and hostile aggression. Ministers did not explain in what sense these terms were to be understood, and it therefore became necessary to attend a little to facts, so far as they might be useful in determining whether, on the part of France, there had been, since the conclusion of the treaty of peace, any acts with regard to foreign powers which this country would be entitled to make a ground of remonstrance. On this part of his argument he accordingly examined in detail the system of German indemnities, which he reprobated as subversive of the constitution of the Germanic Empire, and destructive of our influence on the continent. He touched, but more slightly, on the conduct of the French government to Switzerland, and the total subjugation of Italy to its will. On the subject of Holland he descanted with great energy, and pointed out the alarming consequences which French influence in that country presented in the event of a renewal of the war. On the importance of our connexion with Holland he believed that there was no difference of sentiment, and took particular notice of the opinion which an Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fox) had expressed on that subject. He described with great force the claims which the House of Orange had to our protection from ancient connexion, cemented by common friendship; and the more he considered the fate of this illustrious family, the more was he convinced of the inefficacy of the article in the definitive treaty, which professed to guaranty them a full and complete indemnity. After dwelling at length on these topics, he came to the more particular consideration of circumstances in which the honour of the country was more immediately connected. He called the attention of the House to the treatment which Capt. D'Auvergne had experienced in Paris, in consequence of orders issued by the French government. What he meant to state he did not pretend to state on authority. He was compelled to speak on the grounds of public notoriety, when he mentioned that this respectable officer, even under the protection of a British commission and a regular passport, had been arrested, thrown into a dungeon, and subjected to interrogatories of the most insulting kind. Such was the account given by public report, and he would ask, whether any thing could be reckoned an attack on our national honour, if such an outrage did not come under this description? There was another topic on which the Hon. and Learned Gentleman descanted at some length. He took occasion to allude to a prosecution now instituted against a foreigner (Mr. Peltier, author of L'Ambigu) for a supposed libel on the French government. He did not mean to give any opinion against the propriety of such a prosecution, but was very pointed on articles which had appeared in the French official journal, containing unbecoming allusions, and very indecent reflections on the character of our Sovereign.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed, that there seemed to be a systematic determination, on the part of some Gentlemen, to impress an opinion that his Majesty's Ministers had compromised the character and tarnished the honour of the country. He deemed it unnecessary at all to follow the Hon. and Learned Gentleman, the far greater part of whose speech referred to topics which had no manner of connexion with the topics under discussion. The Learned Gentleman had stated, in effect, that by the article in the treaty of Amiens respecting the indemnification of the House of Orange, the honour of the country had been committed, and that that pledge still continued unredeemed. It was well known that on this point he had expressed himself far from being perfectly satisfied at what had been allotted as an indemnity to the House of Orange. However, with respect to that subject, he hoped before the recess he should have the honour of making a communication from his Majesty respecting the House of Orange, and which would manifest the feelings entertained by his Majesty for that illustrious House; and which proposition was grounded on reciprocal communications made between his Majesty's Ministers and persons in the confidence of the House of Orange: on this occasion the House would be afforded the opportunity of manifesting their sense of the transactions with respect to that House in a proper and correspondent manner. He could not then be more particular upon this subject, but he would rejoice when the day should arrive in which he should have the opportunity of making the communication. Another point adverted to by the Learned Gentleman was, certain proceedings instituted in this country with respect to libellous publications against the government of France. On this head he would only say, that the French government was entitled to that protection in this country which the government of every other country experienced: it was equally entitled to the same degree of protection, and neither more nor less. He deeply regretted that it was not then in the power of Government to produce those official documents which would give the best and most decisive answers to the imputations thrown out against Ministers, for not holding that sort of language, nor pursuing that line of conduct which the honour of their Sovereign and the character and honour of the country demanded. With respect to what fell from the Learned Gentleman in regard to the affair of Capt. D'Auvergne, he could assure the House the instant it was made known to the British Minister his release was demanded, and that demand was immediately complied with. How then could Ministers be charged with compromising the honour of the country? Not only on that occasion, but in any other instance, let any Hon. Gentleman lay his finger upon any circumstance that has occurred, or any sentiment uttered, that could justify such an imputation. They had spoken with regret of the increased power of France, but had fairly contended, that such a consideration would not warrant them in acts of hostility.

Mr. Fox alluded to the representation given by the Hon. and Learned Member, of the treatment which had been experienced by a British officer from the French government. Admitting this representation to be correct, and allowing that a remonstrance had been made on the subject by Ministers, without obtaining satisfaction, he had not the smallest hesitation in saying, agreeably to the ideas of national honour which he had often had occasion to express, that he should reckon this an insult of such magnitude as to form a very legitimate ground of renewing hostilities. If Capt. D'Auvergne had actually been arrested without the smallest pretext, thrown into a dungeon, and subjected to insulting interrogatories, as had been described; or if the French government refused to give satisfaction to the honour of the country, wounded in the person of a British officer; this would, in his opinion, be a ten thousand times more justifiable ground of war than any thing drawn from the conduct of France in the system of German indemnities, in the invasion of Switzerland, or any other act of usurpation on the continent. Strongly disposed as he was for the preservation of peace, and anxious as he was to prevent, by every exertion of his in that House, the renewal of war, he declared without difficulty, that war was an alternative ever to be preferred to insult and infamy. After a few observations on the influence which the state of the finances of the country ought to have in deterring us from hastily plunging again into war, the Hon. Gentleman vindicated the system he recommended with regard to continental connexions. Those who accused him of inconsistency on this point, he could not allow to have just and comprehensive ideas of policy. Continental connexions were not to be estimated according to a general system. They were to be judged of by a consideration of the circumstances in which the country was placed. He was a friend to continental connexions when they could be advantageous; and at the commencement of the late war he had resisted our entering into them, because the manner in which they were formed was such as to promote nothing but disappointment and disaster. His opinion now was, that the war had left the continent in that state, that, if we had an opportunity of forming an alliance with Austria, and even Russia, he should not think such an alliance justified by policy. Gentlemen might ask, were we never again to form any continental alliances and connexions? To this his answer was easy, and it was, that this must depend on circumstances which might hereafter appear in the situation of Europe. He certainly would not say that such alliances might not be hereafter renewed with advantage, but this was not the moment for such a renewal. Adverting merely to the interests of Austria, he could not conceive it to be either fair or friendly in this country to seek the renewal of any alliance with that power, when such an alliance might only have the effect of exposing her to attacks from France, which she was unable to resist. No man was more anxious than himself to keep up a high spirit in the country, but the time for exerting that spirit was to be regulated by circumstances. What might be very wise and political under certain circumstances, might under circumstances of a different nature be ruinous to our best interests; and he thought, that to embark in foreign connexions at this time, would be to expose ourselves to such consequences. If the House and the country had acquiesced in the peace, and the unsatisfactory state of the continent on which the peace was concluded, the same acquiescence was demanded on every principle of policy and common sense. The Hon. and Learned Gentleman had been offended at charges produced against the late Administration, and had called an Hon. Baronet (Sir Francis Burdett), if such charges were to be persisted in, to come forward and produce the proof on a regular inquiry. He was really astonished to hear Gentlemen making use of such language. Had he and those with whom he had the honour of acting, been slack in demanding inquiry into the conduct of the late Ministers? Had they not from year to year proposed inquiry, and had not the friends of Ministers as generally resisted all investigation? With much more justice might this charge be retorted on the Hon. and Learned Gentleman, and his friends of the new Opposition. They were indeed liable to a charge of inconsistency, which they would not find it so easy to repel. Supporting every public measure, they still were dissatisfied with Ministers. They were perpetually accusing them of imbecility, and yet never had they the boldness and manliness to prefer against them a regular and specific charge. This plan of operation would not, however, suit the Hon. Gentlemen's views. They would not bring forward any charge, though Ministers were to be blamed by indirect accusations. They would not tell Ministers what their faults were, nor would they state what better plan of conduct they would pursue. Mr. Fox answered what had been said about no petitions being presented for peace at the time when the treaty of Amiens was concluded, which he accounted for from the circumstance that Ministers, at their entrance into power, held out hopes of peace, and the country waited to see the sincerity of their professions put to the test. He referred to the subject of the indemnities to the Prince of Orange, and argued, that in this point the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the objections made by the Hon. and Learned Gentleman, was in the mean time satisfactory. He was pointed on the subject of the German indemnities, which he condemned as a system of the most gross violation of all honesty and justice, and adduced this as an additional reason why, for the present at least, German alliances should be avoided. He should rejoice in any plan to reduce French influence on the continent, but of this there was at present no rational prospect.

Mr. WINDHAM considered the speech of his Learned and Hon. Friend (Dr. Laurence) as replete with enlarged views, with acute discrimination, with learning brought to the uses of practical wisdom, with that sound policy which constitutes a great statesman, above any thing which had been on either side of the House heard in the course of this protracted debate. It had been said to be long; but

"Haud sunt longa, quibus nihil est quod denique possis."

The Rt. Hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer had offered a reply to a few of those particulars which were urged by his Learned and Hon. Friend. But was that reply in any manner satisfactory? Was it even pretended that any satisfaction had been obtained for the injury offered to the honour of this country in the person of Capt. D'Auvergne? He was ordered out of the French territories in a space of time within which it was physically impossible for him to comply with the demand. He received this order so as to be hindered by it from prosecuting claims to a great amount in France. Concerning the Prince of Orange, nothing appeared, but that the indemnity stipulated for him by the peace of Amiens was likely to be paid at last in the hard guineas of Britain. The whole transactions of Ministers, and the hints they from time to time threw out in the House, afforded prima facie evidence of the truth of the charges against them. The Rt. Hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer joined, by his own account, firmness with conciliation. But it had been said of a pious fraud, that its fraud was to be seen, but not its piety: and his conciliation was indeed conspicuous, but not his firmness. Of each act they denied that it was mean concession; but thus did the inhabitants of Essex tell you, in travelling through that county, that the unhealthy hundreds were still a few miles farther, till you might pass over the whole county, and beyond its boundaries, without ever coming, if you would believe the inhabitants, to those hundreds of which the air was infamously sickly. He had been accused of a wild passion for war: but his spirit was that of the captain of a merchantman, who would fight only for his owner's interest, not of the captain of a man of war, ready to fight for honour solely. He would ever defend the good faith of our continental allies; true to the spirit of that saying of the satirist, which blames alike, absentem qui rodit amicum, et qui non defendit alio culpante.

LORD CASTLEREAGH proceeded to shew Mr. Fox's ideas of the establishment as too low, while Mr. Windham's were too high; and examining the conduct of France, he inferred the present establishment was necessary. That invasion was possible, he contended, and instanced the arrival of Hoche's fleet off Ireland, evading our fleet which had blocked up Brest, but was driven off by the weather. A storm alone prevented Hoche from landing. The hopes founded on the sudden arming or rising of the people in case of invasion were fallacious, as, however zealous and useful in annoying an enemy, nothing could actually oppose him but a regular force. There was no dread that if an attempt were made on these countries the enemy would be repelled; but, though we might preserve our independence, public credit might suffer. The present establishment was the more necessary, as at the outset of a war we might be able to detach 10,000 men to strike a sudden blow on some distant point. His Lordship dwelt with force and surprise on the endeavours made to prevent continental alliances. Unfortunately, there was no chance of such alliances; but it was likely that certain powers might act in sympathy, wishing well to each other's support. Then why so much disparage alliances? The possibility of arranging them was not great at present; but why check the hope, why discourage foreign powers from looking to this country for assistance? More favourable circumstances may occur when alliances may be practicable; but we should not debar ourselves of the chances those circum-

tances may present. The charge of neglecting the interests of the Prince of Orange was unfounded. It was stipulated in the treaty of Amiens, that an indemnity should be provided for him; and accordingly he had his portion in the general distribution of the German indemnities; a portion, however, inadequate to his loss, which it would be for this country to endeavour to repair in some other way.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, 10TH DECEMBER 1802.

[This day the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER entered into a STATEMENT of the SUPPLY for the year, and the WAYS and MEANS for raising it; a CORRECT ABSTRACT of which will be found in page 778 of this volume.]

HOUSE OF LORDS, 13TH DECEMBER 1802.

EARL SPENCER, on the question for the first reading of the Malt Tax Bill being regularly put, observed, that with respect to the course he was about to adopt relative to the bill before their Lordships, a variety of precedents applied, as a reference to the Journals would evince: the present was the first bill of supply which was before the House the present session. It was agreed on all sides, that the present crisis of affairs was the most critical and momentous ever known in the history of the country, and whatever tended to its illustration, should be regarded with the most anxious attention. He understood it to be perfectly regular and parliamentary to refer to those various branches of service as matters of discussion, which had been already voted, and which were to be covered by the supply arising out of the bill in question. The situation of the country rendered it necessary that those advantages, for purposes of discussion, should be resorted to. In considering the general subject, the part which struck him as objectionable on the part of Ministers, was the total absence of that information, which certainly ought to accompany a proposition to Parliament for such a great and unprecedented increase of the establishment. They were to consider, that the country was now in a state of peace, and that a short interval had elapsed since the conclusion of war. The House would also recollect what the language of Ministers had been in former discussions, and the hopes they held forth of the probable permanence and durability of peace: under such circumstances, therefore, taking them on the grounds laid down by Ministers themselves, he would say, that the proposed establishments were, at such a period, totally unprecedented:—and further, it would appear, from a reference to the Journals, that in such periods as the present no augmentation was ever made to the military establishment without a communication of the causes thereof, in some shape or other. In every instance where such measures were resorted to, from the peace of Ryswick to the present moment, it was uniformly the practice. Of this the reigns of King William and Queen Anne would amply furnish instances: but he would particularly advert to a speech from the Throne, made by King George I. soon after his accession, it was no great distance subsequent to the peace of Utrecht, and particularly stated, that notwithstanding the favourable conclusion of that war, certain augmentations of the national force would be necessary, until some measures for the farther security of Great Britain and its trade should be adopted. This was a precedent he considered more than ordinarily applicable to the present situation of the country, and he thought that his present Majesty would be well warranted in so addressing his Parliament. The Noble Earl continued, that his objections by no means went to the extent of the proposed establishments; the manner in which they were proposed, and the circumstances attending the proceeding, was what he disapproved of. He thought the verbal declarations of Ministers no sufficient grounds for Parliament to proceed upon in the manner required; nor was there any thing in the addresses of the House on the occasion of the treaty, which he thought could justify such measures. When he considered the language formerly held by Ministers, he was induced to suppose, that some material change must have taken place in the state of affairs, respecting which Parliament were left in complete ignorance—but the House should consider what had been the practice on similar occasions in former instances, and act accordingly. In this part of his speech his Lordship alluded to the escape of a notorious traitor, respecting whom no vigorous or decisive steps were taken to bring him to well-deserved punishment, through the apprehension, as it would appear, of offending the French government. Nor was this the only instance in which Ministers had failed; the case of a worthy and distinguished naval officer, who had been recently ill-treated at Paris, furnished another; if what he had heard respecting it was true, he should be incapable of repressing his indignation. He held it his duty to impress upon the House the necessity of pausing at least until some satisfactory information was laid before them on the subject, and which, he trusted, would lead to distinct and regular communications to Parliament upon the subject.

LORD PELHAM did not feel it necessary to enter into any detailed observations on the topics adverted to by his Lordship. One or two points, however, he could not avoid noticing, one of which he hardly thought it possible a peer of the Noble Earl's candour would consider in the manner he seemed to do, namely, that Ministers in a particular instance could.

fail in their duty through any apprehension of offending the French government. Were the Noble Earl apprised of the circumstances of the case, he could not see it in the point of view he appeared to do. A considerable degree of misunderstanding prevailed with respect to that affair, and Ministers, under all the circumstances of the case, acted as they thought best became the honour and conducted to the service of their country; he was not then prepared to detail all the particulars of the case; but he was satisfied, that, upon inquiry, the Government would be found to have acted in the way he mentioned. With respect to the gallant officer, Capt. D'Auvergne, no possible imputation could rest upon Ministers. It was true that he had been arrested by an officer of the police, and for a short time confined in Paris; but the moment it was known to the British Minister, application was made to the Minister of Foreign Relations, and by that means he was instantly released. He thought it his duty to observe in this manner upon those two points.

The EARL of CARLISLE said it forcibly struck him, when he compared the present conduct of Ministers with the sentiments they formerly expressed, that some material change must have taken place in their councils—the proposed establishment could never be thought necessary after a peace which Ministers seemed to consider as well made; however, he wanted nothing extraordinary or particular from them, notwithstanding the acknowledged critical situation in which the country was placed, but merely to follow the rules laid down by their ancestors on similar occasions; and he would defy any Noble Lord to shew where it was proposed to incur any great additional expense, without accompanying the proposition by a communication from the Crown, in some shape or other. Speaking of the impolicy of the Ministerial conduct, he said, their concessions, instead of securing peace, led to war. The present intended augmentation in an early period of peace, was beyond all former precedent; 55,000 men for the navy, and 130,000 for the army, which together would involve us in an expense little short of ten millions. This would operate as a severe burden upon the country; and when asked as to the reasons of all this expense, Ministers made no answer, but referred to circumstances of alleged public notoriety. He observed, that no important change had taken place since the peace, which could not well and easily have been foreseen previously to that period; but it seems great stress was laid on the “tone” and “temper” in which the pacification was concluded on the part of our adversaries: this consideration was too futile to be seriously combated. In conclusion, he observed, that if it was with a reference to the apprehension of impending danger that those large establishments were proposed, let there be a regular and distinct communication made to Parliament upon the subject.

The DUKE of NORFOLK adverted to the notoriously increased power of France as a ground for the justification of the present conduct of Ministers. He agreed with part of the conduct of Ministers with respect to Mr. Tandy, who, however, it was his opinion, ought never to have been tried; and he disapproved of the circumstances attending his arrest, which took place in a small independent state, unable to oppose the will of belligerent powers. Upon the whole, he thought Government acted wisely in suffering him to go unpunished.

The EARL of LIMERICK expressed his surprise at the objections started by the Noble Lords. Their Lordships were not to be then told, that the whole continent of Europe was in fact disjointed and new-modelled. Great Britain was the sole country which retired from the late contest with undiminished territories and an unimpaired constitution. Under these circumstances, he thought an adequate degree of confidence ought to be reposed in Ministers in proportion to the emergency. England, however, need entertain no fears, but should adopt a plan of prudent caution. A subject too contemptible to have many words wasted upon it, had by some means crept into the discussion: he alluded to the affair of Tandy; but what had taken place with respect to him, had no sort of reference to any foreign power whatever. The House had heard what had fallen from the Noble Secretary of State. Tandy's rebellious attempts were well known; but he wished the subject had been entirely kept out of the discussion; it was too contemptible to have either words or time wasted upon it; and in the possible contingency of future operations, it would be rather advantageous the French should employ so useless and insignificant a tool. With regard to the instance of Capt. D'Auvergne it was otherwise; but it was to be observed, that the moment his detention was known to the King's Minister at Paris, application was made, and that gallant officer released. He saw nothing in the national circumstances which should warrant despondency. With respect to his Majesty's present Ministers, in whom he had the highest confidence; they had made the best peace that could be obtained; they saw there was no salutary object to be attained by continuing the war; and they saved our finances from farther injury by pacification.

LORD GRENVILLE observed, that what fell from the Noble Lord (Limerick) should always meet with attention and respect—but before he proceeded farther, there was one point which he must observe upon, namely, the impression what fell from the Noble Secretary of State made upon the House, and upon the Noble Lord in particular, respecting the affair of Capt. D'Auvergne: on this, however, had Noble Lords taken the pains to inform themselves correctly, the result would be different—and he was strongly of opinion, that the case merited further inquiry. With regard to the case of Napper Tandy, he felt it incumbent on him to say a few words: he widely differed from the opinion expressed by the Noble Duke, and he must pointedly deny, that his apprehension at Hamburgh was at all contrary to law; so far from it, the process was strictly conformable to the known laws of that city; and it was done principally to shew, that England felt herself as much entitled to justice in that quarter, and to the benefit of those laws, as France experienced in other instances. With respect to the question regularly in discussion before the House, his opinion was, that, under all the circumstances of the case, the bill ought not to be then read. It was the uniform custom of Parliament, "lex et consuetudo Parliamenti," that no great supplies should be granted, except for reasons distinctly assigned—this would appear on the Journals, and he thought that the House should pause, and follow the example of our ancestors in all occasions of large supply; which, if former periods merited their laudable caution, what must one like the present do, which was allowed universally to be so alarming and momentous? He combated the idea that it was intended to force improper explanations from Ministers—explanation from them was the present object; a distinct and regular communication from the Throne was requisite on such an occasion; and speaking of the language which had been used in the discussions of the general subject, his Lordship made some allusions to what had been held in the other House of Parliament, to shew the inconsistency of those who maintained opinions contrary to those urged from his side of the House. They did not now call on Ministers to justify themselves; their observations tended to blame them for not advising a royal communication on the occasion; and their object was, by a temporary delay of the progress of the bill, to afford them an opportunity of rectifying that omission. In thus observing, he wished it to be understood, that he offered no opinion as to the extent of the proposed establishments, the policy and wisdom of which was entirely relative: his opinions on this part of the subject he would reserve for future opportunities of discussion; he would only observe, that if 130,000 men were deemed an adequate number while we retained Malta and the Cape, it would be redundant in case those possessions were given up. With respect to these, the conduct of Ministers was notorious; the Cape, particularly, which they had determined on, and afterwards hesitated to surrender—at length the former measure was fatally determined, and perhaps the last orders were executed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. With respect to the affair of Tandy, and to what had been said generally upon his case, he would remind the House that he had been legally convicted of high treason; and in considering that point, he must observe to a Noble Earl, whose high private character and worth will always cause what falls from him to be attended with respect, though he wished to make the observation in the most respectful manner possible, that the substance of his observation on the case of Tandy had a tendency to reflect upon the administration of justice in this country. So far from what he had observed being well founded, the Noble Earl might as well say, the advice he had had the honour of giving his Sovereign on Wednesday last, in reference to the disposal of some highwaymen, was influenced by the fear of the First Consul of France, as that the conduct of Ministers with respect to Tandy was so influenced. A great deal had been said respecting the late treaty of peace. On that head he, as well as others, felt like an old Englishman; but its merits had already been decided on: it was made according to the best of the judgment of Ministers. Under all the circumstances, they thought it their duty to conclude it; but was it not notorious, that the circumstances of the continent had been changed, and the power of France incalculably increased? These points should be considered. In reference to increased establishments, the immense line of coast possessed by France should also be taken into the calculation.

HOUSE OF LORDS, 15TH DECEMBER 1802.

The order of the day being read for going into a committee on the Malt Tax Bill,

EARL SPENCER rose, and observed, that on a former stage of this bill, he had taken the liberty to offer his sentiments on one or two important points connected with the measure, and he had to return his thanks to the House for the very liberal indulgence with which they heard him on that occasion. In the present instance he rose in obedience to the paramount calls of duty, and to offer his opinions more in detail upon these and other points, which he deemed of the most momentous importance to the country. But first he should have to advert to what had fallen from a Noble and Learned Lord on the former debates, who seemed, by what he then said, to have entirely misapprehended his meaning. This misconception might probably be owing to his own inaccuracy of expression at the time; but he would now repeat his opinion, that with respect to the establishments he had no objection, as far as their extent was to be considered; that is, as far as they exceeded former establishments. Such was not his ground of objection, and for obvious reasons, as the opinions he entertained of the late treaty of peace were well known to be unfavourable to that measure, on the ground of its probable want of permanence and its insecurity. With respect to the measure more immediately before the House, and the several important points connected with it, he had three distinct grounds of objection: First, as to the manner in which the present supplies were proposed, which was different from any former precedent; secondly, as applicable to the proposed naval and military establishment; and thirdly, as to the probable use which may be made of the forces so voted. With respect to the first head of objection, as he had troubled the House rather at length thereon on the former debate, he should not trespass much on their Lordships' attention. After all that had been urged on that point, not only by himself, but more especially by those with whom he had the honour to act, he had no hopes of being able to induce Noble Lords opposite to him to alter their opinions on that part of the subject; however, after the best attention he was able to give to the point, and after the maturest reconsideration, he remained himself of the same opinion with regard to it. He was convinced of its importance with respect to the regularity and integrity of the proceedings of Parliament; and unless he should hear arguments advanced in the course of this night's debate to induce him to change his opinion, he should deem it his duty to record it on the journals of the House. With regard to his second head of objection, the nature and extent of the establishments voted, the Noble Earl observed somewhat in detail. The amount of the respective forces was, he said, for the land service 130,000 men, and for the naval 55,000. Parliament was without adequate or regular information as to the causes, the necessity, &c. of having establishments to that extent; they must therefore consider them as well as they could, and decide upon information from the best quarter they could get it. With respect to the land force, it had been, he conceived, voted on grounds which he knew not well how to describe; but he conceived it to be done on the idea of the strictest defensive system; that the situation of the country was such as to require a land force to that amount, either with a reference to home defence, or for services abroad. In regard to this, when he reflected on the considerable augmentation to the numbers he had mentioned, by the militia force and the volunteers, he saw no reason to object to the establishment on the ground of a defensive system. With respect to the constitution and arrangement of this force, he highly approved of it; it was well directed and appointed, and the plan did the highest honour to the illustrious Personage at the head of his Majesty's land forces. In regard to the naval establishment, he regretted that he could not say as much. He was sorry that the Noble Lord at the head of that department was absent, but duty called upon him to state his opinion upon a point of such importance notwithstanding. He by no means thought the naval adequate to the land establishment. He was aware it had been said, that at a short notice sixty additional sail of the line could be prepared and brought into service. He was glad to hear this, but at the same time was not quite so well convinced of its practicability, and particularly with respect to the manning of such a force. It was asserted that this could be effected in so short a space as a month; but he knew the nature of manning the navy too well to entertain such an opinion. That measure was dependant on such a number of extensive circumstances, some of which it was entirely out of the power of Government to control, that he was decided as to its impracticability within that space. With respect to the third head of objection, the use which would be made by Ministers of these powers, he had first to observe, that what fell from the Noble Lord on the woolsack the other night, as to the discretionary powers vested in Ministers with respect to keeping it, instead of removing, increased his objections in a considerable degree. He had always understood, that whenever a specific force was voted, there was a constitutional and implied engagement on the part of the Crown to keep up the stipulated force, and hold it in readiness to act when occasion required. In this instance, therefore, former precedents were departed from; and the line of conduct adopted by Ministers with regard to the establishments, strengthened his objections to the present arrangement. Three times in a former session did they come to Parliament with different estimates of forces. In June last particularly, 70,000 men were voted, of which it appeared that 20,000 were not long after disbanded. Such a practice might obtain in the present instance, and, consequently, no security could be had in the discretion of Ministers. The uniform tenour of the Ministers, at least since the peace, made him entertain apprehensions of that sort. He had no hostility towards any, and for some of them he entertained the highest respect; but considerations of duty superseded every other. The present crisis was such, as that on the conduct of its government must depend either the ruin or the salvation of the country; and, in considering this part of the subject, it was in vain to keep out of sight the gigantic power of France, her extended empire, uniform system of aggression, and her late accessions of territory. The conduct of that power with respect to one part of the treaty of peace, he was of opinion, included a breach of stipulation: he meant that relative to the House of Orange, whose real indemnity it was not improbable would be ultimately furnished by this country. He then adverted to the accession of territory made by the French out of Europe, particularly the region of Louisiana; and it was understood to be in agitation, on the part of Holland, to surrender Cochín to the French government.

This he conceived to be a most important consideration with respect to our Indian empire. But he had no hesitation to say, that Ministers themselves did not know what system they were acting upon, or what line of conduct it would be preferable to pursue. Of this, their conduct respecting Malta and the Cape furnished striking instances; their orders and counter-orders respecting the retention or surrender of these settlements, and their conduct with respect to the conquered colonies in the West Indies. He however begged it to be understood, that he disclaimed the idea of wishing to urge Ministers to rush into a war. The line of policy he endeavoured to recommend, that of firmness and vigour, was the surest means of asserting the honour of the country, and preserving the blessings of peace: but when he considered the weak, impolitic, and wavering conduct of Ministers, he could entertain little hopes in these points of view. On the contrary, had they acted on the truly wise and energetic system laid down by their predecessors, and followed it up with vigour and effect, he would have supported them with much more spirit and alacrity than he now felt it necessary to oppose them. The resources of the nation he was well convinced were perfectly adequate to the situation in which it was unfortunately placed by the conduct of Ministers—but then they must be directed by other hands, and administered by men of superior talents, spirit, and abilities, in order to bring them fully into action; to extricate her from her present difficulties, and to render her once more great and glorious. A gun may in every respect be capable of performing service, but it must be directed by skilful hands to render it efficacious. A boat or ship may be in perfect order, but an able steersman and expert mariners were necessary to render it of service. Upon the whole, and under all the circumstances of the case, he felt it his duty at present to object to their Lordships proceeding to the order of the day.

The LORD CHANCELLOR observed, that the question regularly before their Lordships was, whether they would read the order for going into a Committee to consider of a bill of supply, which not only went to affect the military establishment, but even the civil existence of the country; it was a bill, which in that House had been regularly voted without opposition, from year to year, and which they would bear in mind, not only regarded the naval and military, but the civil establishments of the country. In the course of what had fallen from the Noble Earl who spoke last, some observations had been made which he felt himself imperiously called upon to answer. They regarded that part of the conduct of the late Administration, which related to the measures adopted by them, against those who were endeavouring, by means of sedition and treason, to destroy the government, and to subvert the constitution of the country. The guilt of those meaasures, if guilty they are, lay as much on his shoulders as on those of any member of the late Administration; and he would agree that their successors may well be deemed weak and void of energy, did they hesitate a moment, in case of necessity, to tread in the steps of their predecessors in that particular, and temporarily to supersede the liberty of the country, in order permanently to secure it; and should they hesitate upon such salutary and saving measures, he would no longer form a part of that Administration; but the reason they were not resorted to was, simply because they were not necessary. He would not follow the Noble Lords in those points which were irrelevant to the subject in discussion, nor particularly the last Noble Speaker, through the whole conduct of the late Ministry. With regard to them, however, he was aware, that no set of men could more fully maintain the honour and preserve the happiness of the country in a greater degree than they did; and he supported them through the whole of their administration with all his heart and soul. He would put it to the heart and feelings of the Noble Earl who took the lead in this debate, if the tendency of his arguments did not amount to this—that they ought to refuse their assent to the bill of supply before them; not because the establishments to be provided for by it were unnecessary or excessive—not because the situation of the country did not obviously require them—but because those in whose hands their application was intrusted, could not make a wise use of them? He had had the honour of fighting side by side with that great Minister so often alluded to in recent debates; and he would ask, would that great person refuse to assent to such a bill as the present, at a moment when the circumstances of France rendered it necessary that the country should be, not certainly with a drawn sword, but in a state of readiness to recur vigorously to defensive measures, should the conduct of the former render it necessary? Such would not be the conduct of that great man. And, with respect to the insinuations of charges against his Majesty's present Ministers, the language of the person he alluded to on former occasions was emphatically, that those who urged addresses for the removal of Ministers, should boldly state the specific causes upon which the proceeding should be founded. Were contrary principles acted upon, the circulation, the vital blood of the country would be stopped. If Ministers were to be removed, let it be on distinct and express grounds: and here his Lordship having occasion to recur to the conduct and principles of the great Minister before alluded to, spoke of his character in strains of the warmest eulogium, as one whom the bounty of Providence, with a reverence to his transcendent talents and virtue, caused not his equal to be born in the course of centuries. He knew that great and virtuous man to be grossly abused and libelled, while the object of his measures was alone the preservation of genuine freedom:—to that end, he well knew, the thoughts of that person were anxiously directed. Never yet did any man more richly deserve the applause of the virtuous and the good! Recurring then to the subjects in discussion, the Noble and Learned Lord observed, that, in arguing the question, those in opposition uniformly occupied the “vantage ground:” they had referred to the consideration of alliances, and their effects, without seeming to consider how far that Administration, of which those Noble Lords so worthily formed a part, was implicated in those measures; how many were signed by the late Noble Secretary of State, and were necessarily dissolved even during his continuance in office! The present Ministers had been repeatedly censured for reducing the forces of the country; but it was not considered that such reduction was necessary, and often one of the most desirable effects of peace. It was unnecessary now to enter into a vindication of that important measure; he would only fervently pray to God that it may not, as the Noble Lords had augured (his hopes and convictions were otherwise) turn out prejudicial to the country; but, at any rate, the present vote was not to be decided by that measure. With respect to the Noble Earl’s first objection, as to the manner in which the present supply was proposed, it was then unnecessary for him to answer it. In regard to his second point, the details of the establishments, it was some satisfaction to him, that the Noble Earl did not object to them on the score of extent. He did not profess himself to be adequately conversant in those subjects, but he could not refrain from observing again, that the Noble Lords took the “vantage ground,” in not considering these establishments with a reference to the naval and military facilities of France; and in this point of view he doubted not they would be found well apportioned, and commensurate to the circumstances and necessities of this country. In arguing these points, his Lordship displayed much ability and information; and concluded with a reservation, that it could not fairly be said, that the day may not arrive in which these forces may be consistently and safely reduced. But were the question to be decided on the grounds urged by the Noble Earl, it were impossible the funds and forces of the country could be turned to a wise or salutary use. If such were the Noble Earl’s real sentiments, he would put it to his justice, whether his motion should be directed not against the bill of supply, but for the removal of Ministers? Upon such principles he had always acted with the great man before alluded to, with the Noble Lords themselves, and with the ancestor of a Noble Lord on the bench with them. (We believe the Noble and Learned Lord alluded to Lord Kenyon, who was present.) With respect to the peace, and the important circumstances connected with it, he felt like an Englishman

all over; there were many points connected with that, but more especially with the present subject, which he should think himself very unworthy of the situation he had the honour to hold, if he were weak enough to enter into a discussion of at present. He spoke his sentiments on this head, with the feelings of a man who humbly hoped that those who went before should not have to reproach them with such a dereliction of duty; they would act upon the same great and leading principles, and they would strive to preserve the peace, and endeavour to save the country.

EARL SPENCER observed, that the Noble Lord had misapprehended the object of his argument when he supposed it was to suspend the progress of the bill until the present Administration was removed; if he should have said any thing to that effect, it was not his intention to have said it.

The EARL of CAPEL observed, that what had been so misconceived was not the object of Lords on his side of the question; their wish was only that the House should pause until Ministers would condescend to tread in the steps of their ancestors upon similar occasions, and conform to the established practice of Parliament. In every former instance they required information, and adequate explanation as to the reasons and causes always accompanied the requisition. As things stood, they were abandoned entirely to conjecture; and they might be strongly inclined to think that some material change had taken place, when they recollected what was passed about the close of last session, as an adequate establishment, and compared it with what was demanded at present. The Noble Earl then adverted to the recent occurrences on the continent, the acquisitions to the territories of France, and the affairs of Switzerland, respecting which Ministers left the House in complete ignorance. He repelled the idea, that the object of the present conduct of the Lords who acted with him was a change of Ministers: neither was it a part of their views to urge them to a war; such insinuations were unfounded: their real objects were, the honour and security of the country. In the present instance he insisted it would be right to afford time to Ministers to follow the example of their ancestors upon similar occasions.

The EARL of DARNLEY expressed his apprehensions in strong language at the increasing power of France, which, conjoined with Russia, he was of opinion, could give laws to the whole world, Great Britain excepted.—He would support Ministers as long as they upheld the national honour, and provided for its security. At the same time, he could not withhold his tribute of applause to the chacharacter of the great Minister so often alluded to of late. His abilities, integrity, and, above all, his firmness, spirit, and courage, were beyond any thing he could express. He then recurred to the situation of France, and the character of the person at the head of its government, whose ambition he considered as far from being satiated. One great object of his ambition seemed, he conceived, to be the subjugation of this country. He longed to break open the doors of the Bank of England with his legion of honour, and to plant the republican standard on the Tower of London. He would freely speak his sentiments independent of ministerial considerations—he deemed large establishments requisite in the present state of the country, and as such approved of the bill before the House.

LORD HOBART affirmed, that the honour of the country had not been sullied by the conduct of his Majesty's present Ministers: not one of them would continue in office, were they necessitated to submit to any act which tended to sully the national honour. With respect to the subject in discussion, he must express his surprise at the perseverance of Lords in opposition, after the very candid and satisfactory explanation given by his Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack, in the last debate. He contended, that the causes for the establishments thus called for were of sufficient public notoriety for Parliament to proceed upon. Nor was that all; he could as effectually contend, that the measures now under discussion were duly and adequately adverted to in the speech from the Throne. In illustration of which position, his Lordship read several striking extracts; and it was to enable his Majesty to give effect, in case of necessity, to the language so delivered, that the augmentation in question was deemed necessary, and for which, he must insist, the Royal communication had laid an adequate foundation. The charge of the Noble Lords, therefore, that the whole proceeding was rested on the ground of public notoriety, was unfounded. Upon those principles, it would be necessary that his Majesty's Speech should be accompanied by a geographical description of France and its territorial acquisitions, and also by a schedule of her military establishments. When the Noble Lords admitted they did not object to the extent of the establishments, upon what solid or substantial grounds then could they advance? The establishments existing in France were matter for serious consideration in the discussion of the subject before them, and for the information of the House. His Lordship read some extracts from a recent publication (we could not collect the title), wherein the land forces, &c. of France were specified; their power, by one statement therein, was estimated at 495,000 men; and he argued, that this, joined to the other considerations advanced in the course of the debate, were ample grounds for assenting to the supplies already voted by the House of Commons. His Lordship then slightly adverted to some occurrences which took place about the period of the resignation of the late Ministers, and argued therefrom in favour of his general conclusions. He was duly convinced of the delicate situations in which Ministers were often placed—situations which sometimes rendered it as necessary to withhold explanation, as it may be proper to give it in others. After adverting to some points connected with the general subject of discussion, in some degree of detail, he drew inferences therefrom, and adduced additional arguments in favour of the immediate progress of the bill.

LORD CARYSFORT objected that there had not been sufficient information laid before the House, to authorize them to vote for the supply demanded, until more satisfactory statements were made on the part of his Majesty's Ministers. His Lordship discussed at some length the topics which have been already repeatedly urged respecting the relative situation of the country, and observed that he could not help doubting how far his Majesty's Ministers were entitled to confidence, when he considered the dangers to which the country had been exposed during their administration.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK said, that his Majesty's Ministers made a peace, which, if it was not exactly what was wished, he was certain that it met with the concurrence and approbation of nine tenths of the people of this country—of all, in short, who were not led away by motives of private interest to wish for a continuance of the war.

LORD GRENVILLE said, that there never had been a greater perversion of the line of argument adopted by his Noble Friends, than the statement which had been unintentionally, no doubt, made by his Noble and Learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor). It was never the intention of himself, or of his Noble Friends, to oppose the supplies, but it was merely a question as to time. The opposition was merely to the order of the day being now read, in the hope that some communication might in the mean time be made from his Majesty, with respect to the motives upon which they were called upon to vote the supplies. His Majesty's Ministers had not thought proper to advise his Majesty to make any specific communication as to the particular circumstances of the country; all the information they had upon the subject was ambiguous and unsatisfactory. He had taken some pains to search the Journals of the House for a century back, and he had found it had been invariably the practice, with the exception perhaps of a few instances, which would make little in favour of his Majesty's Ministers, that some specific grounds had been stated to Parliament as to the particular line of conduct which they were called upon to pursue. After the treaty of Lisbon, the peace of Utrecht, the treaty of Paris, and other events of a similar nature, some information was imparted, which served as a clue to guide the Legislature with respect to the relative situation of the country. In the memorable speech of George the First, immediately after the accession of the House of Hanover, it was stated, that the peace was insecure, and that it was necessary to cement continental alliances. In the present case, however, all the information given was vague and unsatisfactory. He did not wish hastily to oppose his Majesty's Ministers, but he could not help thinking that the return of the Right Hon. Gentleman to power, who had so ably presided over the late Administration, was wanted, and that those who opposed his return were guilty of a deep injustice towards their country. Large supplies were called for, but what was the difference in the situation of the country? The hostility of France towards this country was the same, whilst her power was increasing; and if that was the case, why should it have been stated, as it had been at one time since the peace, that an establishment of 30,000 seamen would be sufficient, when at the present moment a larger establishment was called for? The military and naval establishments now called for, were, it was stated, as great as the faculties of the country were enabled to provide for; but it should be recollected, that proposing these establishments was like erecting a dam, which was not to exceed a certain height, against a torrent which was continually increasing; the dam might be able to stem the stream to-day, but to-morrow the torrent would increase, and its impetuosity receive an additional force. We were called upon, it was stated, to execute the treaty of Amiens, whilst France had acted in defiance of it; surely, however, it was necessary to pause before we delivered up the Cape and Cochin, which were the keys of the East Indies; and Malta, which was the key of the Mediterranean. The Cape and Cochin had, it seemed, been already surrendered. As to Malta, information was still wanted, whether it was retained as a matter of policy with respect to the general relations of this country, or whether only until certain stipulations, agreed upon in the treaty of Amiens, were fulfilled; stipulations which, he contended, ought never to have been entered into. He could not conceive, however, that Malta ought to be the subject of a separate and distinct question; it ought only to be comprised in the general question respecting the relations between this country and France. He had the highest respect for his Noble and Learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor), but he was fully aware, that the numerous avocations of his Noble and Learned Friend, precluded him from attending very minutely to the political situation of the country; he could only in this way account for the opinion delivered by his Noble and Learned Friend, which he considered as very fatal to the country, that we must have large establishments, in order to be upon our guard against the designs of France; and that we must trust to time for an amelioration of our situation. He well knew, that much was to be allowed to events; but he could not help observing, there was not much probability at present that the power and predominance of France would decrease; and when it was stated that the establishments now required were as great as the faculties of the country could bear, it was informing France of the extent of our resources, of which she might with facility take advantage. He wished it to be thoroughly understood, that he had no desire for war; he only wished for a firm and vigorous conduct on the part of his Majesty's Ministers.

LORD PELHAM said, that as to what the Noble Lord (Lord Grenville) had advanced respecting Cochin, that Noble Lord might be in possession of some information upon the subject, but certainly his Majesty's Ministers had received no intelligence of its surrender. He disclaimed the opinion advanced by the Noble Lord, as that of his Majesty's Ministers, that they intended to trust merely to time, as it was certainly their intention to take advantage of every circumstance upon the continent, which could contribute to the security of this country. The Noble Lord had alluded to a supposed misrepresentation of the sentiments of the Noble Lord's friends in the course of the night, as if it had been stated that they wished to refuse the supplies; he confessed he could not see much difference between stopping and arresting the supplies. It had been observed by the Noble Lord, alluding to a statement made in another place, that a much smaller peace establishment had been originally mentioned, than that which was now called for; but it would be recollected that the statement alluded to only implied, that the number of seamen wanted would not be less than 30,000, not that they would not exceed that number. The Noble Lord had expressed much friendship for his Majesty's Ministers; but certainly whatever might be the expressions of the Noble Lord and his friends, the effect of their opinions went to the removal of those Ministers; and if the Noble Lord and his friends really held those opinions which they had advanced, it was certainly their constitutional duty to endeavour, according to the forms of Parliament, to procure the removal of those Ministers, a step which he should certainly take if the Noble Lord and his friends were in office; and he held the same opinion of them which they seemed to entertain of himself and his Noble and Hon. Colleagues. With respect to the call made by the Noble Lord for the return of a Right Hon.

Gentleman into office, he should only say, that neither himself nor his colleagues opposed any obstacle to that return.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, 29TH DECEMBER 1802.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER rose, and moved that the House do now adjourn until the 3d day of February next; upon which

Mr. ELIOT said, that he could not help expressing his decided opposition to the motion just now made by the Right Hon. Gentleman. It was universally known and acknowledged, that the country was at this moment placed in a state of unparalleled danger, in a state such as required the most anxious caution, the most unremitting vigilance. Indeed, after the various deliberations that had already taken place upon this serious and important subject, how could he help being filled with surprise on observing that a motion should be made for the House now to adjourn for five weeks, without Ministers having condescended to afford any thing like parliamentary information respecting the present perilous posture of public affairs? Is there any man now so sceptical about the views which France is pursuing, as to doubt that she is actuated by a most dangerous spirit of ambition and aggrandizement? or can any man who observes that spirit, observe it without painfully feeling the imminence of the perils to which our present situation is exposed? When we observe the workings of that spirit, what do we behold? Do we not see, that, instead of endeavouring to avail herself of the advantages of peace, France is comporting herself as if under the uncertainty of an armistice? Instead of reducing, is she not enlarging, the scale of her establishments? Is she not increasing her forces both by sea and land? Is she not replenishing her arsenals, and multiplying every possible mean of aggression? and, with all these symptoms of preparation before us, is the House to separate and retire without obtaining the least information respecting matters of such weighty importance? It is known that we are still in possession of Malta; but whether we still retain the Cape of Good Hope or not, is doubtful. It does not appear that Alexandria has yet been evacuated; neither is it explained why so long a delay has occurred in evacuating it. Whether we are to retain or surrender these possessions, or when the different conditions of the treaty of Amiens will be fulfilled, are points respecting which the House was left completely in the dark. There were also other reports of an alarming nature abroad: Cochin is said to be delivered up to France; the same was likely to be the fate of the Floridas. All these things are said to be going on; yet at the same time it appears we are to be dismissed without obtaining the least information respecting such momentous interests, without being able to say to our constituents whether there was any foundation for such rumours or not. The House is likewise left uninformed whether any attempts have been made at establishing any commercial intercourse with France, or with the allies of France; or what may be the consequence of not having revived the former existing treaties. Upon all these topics, so closely connected with the vital interests of the country, no light whatever was afforded, and in that state of ignorance were Members sent back to their constituents, wholly unable to satisfy them for what purposes such large establishments have been voted; wholly unable to tell them what they may have to hope, or what to fear. France, meanwhile, continued to infringe on the rights of almost every surrounding nation, without its being determined whether the conditions of the peace were fulfilled, or when they would be fulfilled. Under such a doubtful aspect of affairs, it could not be proposed to adjourn the House, unless Ministers were prepared to give some satisfactory information respecting the state of the country, which state was surely more perilous than at any other period when such an adjournment was ever before moved. Such a motion he, for one, could not agree to; for he was satisfied that it must tend materially to affect the interests of the country, and let down the dignity of Parliament.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER began by observing, that the Hon. Gentleman who spoke last, seemed to contend that on all hands it was admitted that the country was in a state of unexampled danger. He must beg leave to say, that he for one could not accede to such an admission; and he might, perhaps, with equal confidence assert, that if the opinion of the majority of the House, and of the people, were taken upon this question, it would be found that they were no parties to such an admission. He must also beg leave to remind the House, that he never had underrated or disguised the danger that might be apprehended from the spirit of aggrandizement which seemed to actuate the French government; on the contrary, it was always his wish that the most unwearied vigilance should be kept up; that the utmost caution should be observed; but, at the same time, he could not help being struck with those gloomy insinuations in which the Gentlemen opposite to him were so prone to indulge (without the least bad intention, most undoubtedly, on their part), but which, however, must have a strange effect in the eyes of Europe, by continually holding out this country as placed in a situation of unexampled danger. If any such danger existed, Parliament had already wisely provided the means of meeting and averting it; and that precaution of their wisdom in preparing every means of defence and security, fully justified him in making the motion to which the Hon. Gentleman thought proper to object. Besides, if those Gentlemen were so anxious to obtain the information they now call for, was it not rather strange that they should have deferred calling for it till the last day before the recess? The day on which the House was to adjourn was universally known; and when he himself made the motion for postponing the Committees on Undue Returns till the 8th February, he upon that occasion gave notice that it was intended that Parliament should adjourn till within a few days of that day. Parliament had, however, continued to sit longer than it was originally intended, yet no question was put, or no motion made for producing the information now required, until the very last day. Yet the greatest surprise is expressed, that the House should adjourn for five weeks without all this information being produced. In the first place, the vigilance and foresight of Parliament had already adopted such measures as fully secured every mean of defence; and in the second place, if any emergency should arise (which he, however, did not foresee) that should call for the advice of Parliament, was not his Majesty empowered, by a late act, to call his Parliament together within fourteen days? But the Hon. Gentleman says, that in a situation of such unexampled peril as the present, there was no instance of an adjournment being proposed. What the Hon. Gentleman strictly meant by unexampled peril, he should not pretend to determine; but in his opinion the close of the year 1799 was a period of greater danger and difficulty, and yet at that time Parliament was adjourned from October to January; and the proposition for the adjournment was made by men who were well known anxiously to weigh the dangers of the country, and to be equally solicitous to provide for its defence. Indeed an adjournment at this season of the year was usually looked for; it suited the avocations and convenience of individuals, and could be of no detriment to the public service. Even this year Parliament had already dispatched more important public business than perhaps had ever yet been gone through before the Christmas holidays. Even should Parliament now continue to sit, what could they have to do that was not already provided for? He was, therefore, at a loss to see what real foundation there was for opposing the motion of adjournment.

Mr. ELIOT said a few words to explain what he meant by an unexampled state of danger.

Mr. WINDHAM approved of every thing that had fallen from his Hon. Friend, and expressed his surprise at not having received an answer more congenial to his feelings. He should not now enter at any length into the question before the House, because he saw the House was not prepared for the discussion. He must, however, contend that the country was in an unexampled state of danger, and that in the strict and literal sense of the word. Indeed, that the country was in danger, was assumed and allowed by almost every Gentleman who had spoken upon that subject; and the very measures that have been lately adopted, abundantly proved that something very unusual must have called for them. For his part, he always was of opinion that the country was threatened with the most imminent danger, and he begged to be understood not to have abated one jot of that opinion; and though Gentlemen might view that danger in different lights with regard to its extent, yet it was so generally acknowledged to exist, that some more precise and specific information should be given besides what could be gathered from the measures already adopted by the House. The House should have all communicated to them which might be communicated without danger; and there must surely be some intermediate mode between telling every thing and telling nothing. The state of our establishments fully proved that we were in a state of portentous peril; and that whatever preparations may have been made, yet that state could not be converted into a state of security. The measures that have already been taken are merely intended to frustrate attempts at invasion; defensive armour is only to be put on to resist any sudden attack; but are there no other dangers? Is not France roaming all over the world? Do we not seem to say to her, Do what you please, go where you please, so that you keep your hands off us? This is a state of danger against which the defensive armour we have provided will prove of no avail. Nine months had now elapsed since the signing of the definitive treaty; yet the House was still ignorant whether its main provisions were carried into effect or not. Nothing was definitively known respecting the Cape; but the Cape was of more importance than ever since the surrender of Cochin to the French. Under all these circumstances, he must think it improper for the House to separate without obtaining the required information.

The Empire of Germany divided into Departments, under the Prefecture of the Elector of . To which is prefixed, a Memoir on the political and military State of the Continent, written by the same Author. Translated from the French, by William Cobbett.

Preface of the Translator.—Of the importance of the subject treated of in this work, no one can doubt, when he considers that it contains an account of the transfer of whole states, from the hands of one sovereign to those of another; and of the utility of the work itself to the world, the anger which it has excited at St. Cloud is perhaps the best possible proof. It had been published but a very few days; it was hardly known in London, when its existence was proclaimed to the world, and when a most false and scandalous libel was issued against its supposed author, through the columns of the *Moniteur, the official gazette of France, that infamous gazette, in which the sovereign of Britain has been styled a rewarder of assassins.

I had seen the work before it was noticed in the Moniteur, and I was not a little pleased to find in it that information which I had elsewhere sought for in vain. All is now changed upon the continent of Europe; so that the statistical works and maps, published only a few years ago, are of very little use. Besides, those works are too bulky, and deal too much in minute detail, for the purposes of a politician, who is desirous of forming a correct, comprehensive view of the present state of the continent, and of the probable consequences of the alarming changes which have taken place. To furnish a guide in this pursuit, required not only a considerable store of knowledge in general politics, political economy, geography, and military affairs, but also an intimate acquaintance with all those branches of science, as applicable to each individual state of Europe, and as applicable to the whole of them, considered in relation to each other. A mass of information, made up of materials so various, and absolutely demanding many years of personal experience and local observation, is rarely to be met with in the mind of one man, but which seems to have been possessed by the author of this excellent work.—A work which gives us pleasure we naturally wish to communicate to others; and this desire becomes a sort of duty, when, as in the present instance, such a communication appears conducive to the maintenance of the cause of justice and honour.—To the translation of L'Empire Germanique, &c. I have thought it useful to prefix a Memoir on the Political and Military State of Europe, which I have translated from a work of the same author, published some time ago. The two tracts serve to elucidate each other; and are, indeed, in some sort necessary for that purpose.

WM. COBBETT.

London; 18th Jan. 1803.

A Memoir on the Political and Military State in which Europe will be placed, relative to France, by the continental Peace. Written in January 1801, and translated from the French, out of the Journal de M. Peltier.—The governments of Europe are at length acquainted with the terms on which Buonaparté is willing to grant them a prolongation of existence, or rather a suspension of the sentence of destruction, so often and so solemnly pronounced against them by the revolutionary faction, of which he is the head.—It is impossible to dissemble the fact, that, unless assistance be afforded the emperor to repel the peace that has been imposed on him, it will prove as completely binding on the other powers of Europe as if they had consented to it. Let those who doubt this assertion call to their recollection, that Tuscany was lost by the last armistice; and that the disarming of Austria caused, in the course of one twelvemonth, the overthrow of the states of Venice, Genoa, and Rome, together with the kingdoms of Naples and Piedmont, and the republics of Switzerland, Malia, and Egypt. Let us leave to cowardice and infamy the absurd and wicked task of applauding the “moderation” of the laws dictated by Buonaparté; let us examine them with impartiality, and discuss them with moderation, that we may know their immediate tendency, and discover their remote and inevitable consequences, in order to prevent or moderate their fatal effects.—Their immediate consequences are these: the French government remains absolute master of the whole of ancient France, of the Pays-Bas, Holland, Germany on this side the Rhine, of Switzerland, Piedmont, Genoa, the Dutchies of Milan and Modena, the best part of the States of the Church, and of Egypt (the English have lately torn Malta from them, and when peace is restored, I imagine they will give up their infamous conquest of Tuscany†). The name of republic, which is still kept up in Switzerland, Holland, and some parts of Italy, cannot, I conceive, impose on any one, as to the pretended independence of those countries.—Spain, at a distance, from all foreign supplies, without internal strength, isolated and cut off from the whole world by the very enemy that is gnawing her vitals, and waiting for the moment when she may devour her at her leisure, is under the absolute control of France; and no sooner will peace be signed, than the French government will have it in its power to conquer and revolutionize both Spain and Portugal whenever it pleases. The news of this conquest will reach Vienna and Berlin before the armies of these two powers can have marched for the purpose of making a diversion; and were they even to set their armies in motion, by what means could they succeed in snatching them from the hands of the conqueror? Even supposing a cordial co-operation between Austria and Prussia possible, what motive could sufficiently interest in the preservation of a monarchy so distant, two sovereigns, one of whom has been a tranquil spectator of the overthrow of the king of Naples, and the other of the stadtholder? The south of Italy entirely laid open, bereft of the support of the emperor, driven beyond the Adige, torn to pieces by internal dissensions which surpass the horrors of the Guelphs and Ghibelins, waits only for the presence of a French army to submit to the yoke without a struggle. The loss of these two rich and extensive countries, at a period more or less distant, is then a necessary consequence of the proposed peace; unless, indeed, we look for salvation from the “moderation” of the conqueror.—This immense power, which at no former period has had its equal, contains a concentrated population of more than forty millions of souls*, of fifty-two millions, if we include Spain, and of sixty, if we reckon the south of Italy. It is entirely in the hands of a government vigorous, united, and (by the single clause which makes the suspension of established laws to depend on the will of one man) invested with more authority than any human government ever possessed. It reposes on a soil endowed with all the gifts of nature, made fruitful by industry and commerce; and, beyond all comparison, richer, both in natural and acquired productions, than any other spot of the globe of equal extent. I imagine the strongest national prejudice will not deny these advantages to the vast extent of country bounded from Embden to the mouths of the Po, by the ocean, the Mediterranean, and Adriatic, and from the mouths of the Po to the Dollart, separated from the rest of Europe by the Lower Po, the Mincio, the Rhine, and the Ems. The French empire (for the future I shall make use of this expression, to avoid the terms monarchy, republic, league, &c. terms which are equally inapplicable to France, and to the various nations she has subjugated)—the French empire, including the Kingdom of Portugal, which cannot long survive the continental peace, is surrounded by the ocean from the Dollart to the Straits of Gibraltar; from Gibraltar, by the Mediterranean Sea, to the Gulf of Spezzia, supposing for a moment the independence of southern Italy; and by this sea and the Adriatic, as far as the mouths of the Po, on a contrary supposition, which appears far more probable. This vast extent of coast brings France nearer to the three other parts of the globe than any nation of Europe.—The frontier of the French empire may be divided into several lines, each of which we will separately examine. Generally speaking, the Zuyder Zee and the Rhine, as far as the upper extremity of the Lake of Constance; the Alps of Appenzel, Glaris, the Grisons, the Valteline, and Upper Bressan; together with the Lake of Guarda, the Mincio, and the Lower Po, as far as the sea, may be said to separate France from the rest of Europe.—To enter into a more minute detail: the first division of this frontier is the Zuyder Zee; the second, the Rhine, in all its ramifications, as far as the fortress of Schenck; all the strong places of the Lower Meuse, and of Holland. The portion of the United Provinces beyond the Zuyder Zee is relatively of little importance; confined by the Dollart, the Northern and the Zuyder Zee, it is only accessible to the enemy by a marshy frontier, which adds to its defence. To use a military expression, it is an exterior work, difficult to take, difficult to keep, and useless for penetrating still farther.—The third division is the course of the Rhine, from the fortress of Schenck to Coblenz, where it receives the Moselle. During a course of fifty leagues this river has, it is true, no fortresses; but it is every where very deep, and from three to four hundred toises in width. Behind, the Meuse, with its fortresses of Grave, Mæstricht, and Namur, together with the fortresses of Juliers and Luxembourg, the course of the Moselle and Mentz, form before the ancient frontier of France a barrier so formidable, that the coalition, at the period of its greatest strength, and of the relative weakness of France, and after its most brilliant successes, was scarcely able to carry, and that but for an instant.—The same river, from Coblenz up to Germersheim, where it enters Alsace, forms, during the course of thirty-six or forty leagues, the fourth division of the frontier. Nearly in the centre stands the vast fortress of Mentz: Coblenz and Germersheim defend the extremities of the line. The fort of Cassel and the citadel of Coblenz (Ehrenbreitstein) open two entrances into the interior of Germany; the first, by Frankfort and the course of the Meine, into Franconia, Saxony, and even towards Egra, in Bohemia; and the second into Hesse, with the advantage of surprising the troops coming from the north to the relief of the south of Germany. At the back of this line of defence, is the ancient frontier of France, supported by the citadel of Luxembourg, which all engineers agree in considering as the strongest fortress in Europe.—The fifth division of the line is the ancient frontier of France, in Alsace, extending from Germersheim to Basle: its strength is well known. It is now considerably augmented by the possession of Switzerland, which affords the advantage of taking in the flank and rear the troops threatening Alsace from the Brisgau.—The Rhine, from Basle to the lower extremity of the Lake of Constance, covers the sixth division of the frontier of France. This river, it is true, is much narrower in this part than it is lower down, and is defended by no fortress. But to remedy this deficiency, Switzerland presents a succession of excellent positions; and, without entering into details that would render this Memoir purely military, in order to shew the strength of this position, it will be sufficient to call to our recollection how slowly, and through what torrents of blood, the Austrian army, every where victorious, superior in numbers, and under the command of a prince adored by his soldiers, penetrated, in the campaign of 1799, not into France through Switzerland, but merely as far as the Lake of Zurich, which includes, at most, the fourth or fifth part of this country.—The seventh and last division of the frontier of the Rhine, is the Lake of Constance, which may be looked upon as impenetrable.—Above the Lake of Constance, to the country of the Grisons, the Rhine forms, indeed, the limits, but not the barrier of the French empire, though it tends to increase its strength: the real barrier is the Alps of Appenzel, Glaris, the Grisons, &c. This conducts us to the second of the three grand divisions of the frontier of the French empire, viz. the enormous Alps, which, for a space of more than fifty leagues (twenty-five to a degree) measured in a direct line, extend from the head of the Lake of Guarda above Salo, across Upper Bressan, the Valteline, the Grisons, the countries of Sargans and Appenzel, as far as the head of the Lake of Constance, near the mouth of the Rhine.—It is extremely difficult, but at the same time highly important, to form a correct idea of the nature of this frontier. None of the political divisions formerly existing can furnish us with a comparison. We can easily conceive, for example, that the Alps, from the environs of Nice to Mount Cenis, separated Provence and Dauphiny from Piedmont, covering by their flanks a considerable portion of the surface of these two countries to the right and left: the vallies to the east and west of the central chain were respectively occupied by the two states, which generally extended as far as the summit of the upper chain. All the difficulty of penetrating from one of the two countries into the other, consisted in forcing one of the numerous but difficult passages leading to the summit of the upper central chain of mountains, in order to descend again afterwards. All the roads communicating to the two countries were generally in this direction; and the two powers stretching to the common summit had only the first difficulty to overcome before they opened, after two or three days march, on the flat country.—But here the Alps are not interposed between Austria and the French empire, as they were between ancient France and Piedmont; but run, as it were, from one country into the other: they no longer resemble the Rhine dividing Gaul from Germany, but the Danube entering Germany by Hungary.—The chain of the Alps may be considered as a vast current, a river of mountains and of vallies, whose central chain indicates the course of the water, whilst its flanks and collateral chains, with their vallies to the right and to the left, represent the two moieties of the river. The breadth of this current of mountains varies from thirty to forty-five leagues, and in length it runs an uninterrupted course from Nice and the Var, with a variety of inflexions similar to the windings of a river, between Provence, Dauphiny, Savoy, Switzerland, the Grisons, the German Tyrol, Carinthia, Carniole, &c. on one side, as far as Turkey and the mountains of Thrace, formerly called Rhodope and Hæmus, &c. and on the other side, between Piedmont, the Milanese or Lombardy, the Trentin or Italian Tyrol, the provinces of Venice to the north of the Gulf, &c. This river, the head of which may be considered as rising from the extremity of European Turkey, enters into the states of Austria, through which it travels as far as the angular line I have just mentioned, by which it passes entirely into the territory of the French empire. This angular line extends from the Lake of Garda, between Bresciano and Trentin, to the springs of the Oglio, for the space of forty-five miles; from the springs of the Oglio, through those of the Adda and Adige, it enters the Valteline and the Tyrol, crosses afterwards the river of the Inn below the Engadine, and continues by the chain of Mount Rhetico, and the Alps of Sarganz and Appenzel, as far as the Lake of Constance.—The third grand division of the frontier of France still remains to be examined. It extends from the head of the Lake of Garda to the mouths of the Po; and may be divided into three parts: the first is the Lake of Garda, which no army can cross over; the second is the course of the Mincio, supported in an extent of twelve leagues by the two fortresses of Mantua and Peschiera; the third is the Lower Po, from Borgoforte to the sea. The Po, in this part of its course, is deep and rapid, varying in width from four to six hundred toises; and in its approach to the sea divides itself into several arms, enclosing between them a vast extent of territory, intersected by canals, covered with marshes, and consequently impassable. This river is, therefore, the most powerful barrier that France could possibly desire for covering Italy, whose only defence against all the powers of Europe is reduced to a line of fifty leagues; forty of which consist of the course of the Po, such as I have described it, and the other ten, of the course of the Mincio, covered by two powerful fortresses*.—Hitherto I have only considered this frontier as defensive; if we examine it with a view to its means of aggression, all the advantage remains on the side of France. For, beyond the Mincio, there is not, if we except the Adige, any military position as far as the frontiers of Carinthia and Carniole: the small rivers in the state of Venice, viz. the Brenta, the Piave, the Tagliamento, and the Isonzo, are not even powerful enough to arrest an army unsupplied with pontoons. The Oglio, the Adda, the Tesin, the Sessia, and the Doria Baltea, on the contrary, are wide and deep rivers, difficult at all times to pass over, but more especially so for several days after the great falls of water. Such is the insurmountable barrier which, for an extent of three hundred leagues, from the Zuyder Zee to the mouths of the Po, and consequently in a much less compass than the frontiers of any of the great states of Europe, defends France and the countries she has conquered from the combined forces of the continent!—The French, not content with having secured their frontier towns against all foreign invasion, have contrived, by the destruction or conquest of all the fortresses before their country, to increase the facility of penetrating, without molestation, into the neighbouring countries. Not to include the strong places of Holland, they possess Juliers, Luxembourg, Ehrenbreitstein, and Mentz:—Philipsburg, Ulm, and Ingolstadt, might, indeed, have arrested their progress—but they are destroyed! They have secured Mantua and Peschiera; and it may reasonably be presumed, that the possession of these places was the cause of the failure of the negotiations between France and the Emperor. All the fortresses that protected Piedmont against the preponderancy of France have been demolished; and although a barrier against the attacks that France might have to fear on the side of southern Italy is superfluous, they nevertheless possess that barrier in the Po, from Borgoforte to Voghera; whilst from Voghera to the Gulf of Genoa, the excellent fortresses of Tortona and Alexandria, with the castle of Gavi, and the heights of the Appennines, from Gavi to the Gulf of Spezzia, form a frontier which could easily be defended, supposing (what is almost chimerical) the forces of the east coming down to the support of a direct attack made by the forces of the north.—But what, above all, affords to the French empire the means of aggression, is the political and military situations of the neighbouring countries. From the German Sea to the Gulf of Venice, it is only contiguous to one great state, viz. Austria, from the Lake of Constance to the mouths of the Po. The other territories bordering on the new frontier of the French empire, from the head of the Lake of Constance to Embden; that is to say, the extensive and fertile country hemmed in by the course of the

* The importance of this frontier was so sensibly felt by the Roman emperors, that it was the principal cause of their changing the seat of government from Rome to Ravenna, in order that they might at all times be ready to defend the only frontier through which the barbarians (that is to say, the nations of Europe) could penetrate into Italy. The same motive engaged them to dwell sometimes at Milan.

Rhine, from the Grisons to the sea, and afterwards by the Inn, by Austria to the north of the Danube, and by Bohemia, Electoral Saxony, the Weser, and the ocean; this territory, I say, including the circles of Bavaria, Swabia, and Franconia, the greater part of the circles of Westphalia and the Upper Rhine, with a portion of the circle of the Lower Rhine, is divided into more than two hundred states; without arsenals, without fortresses, and almost without troops. The different sovereigns, divided among themselves by reciprocal jealousies, and distrusting the fidelity of their subjects, whose allegiance has long been shaken by the principles of philosophism and jacobinism, tremble at the bare idea of a French army, and at the remembrance of the calamities of the war, which for nine years has pressed so heavily upon them. This vast territory, which, united under one sovereign, would form a most powerful kingdom, will henceforth oppose to the arms of France, I will not say a vigorous resistance, nor even an easy conquest, but a complete, unqualified submission to its will. In fact, during this whole extent of country, and even as far as Magdeburgh and the Elbe, there is not a single place capable of arresting the progress of an army of thirty thousand men, even for three days!

—From the above sketch of the actual state of the continent, it evidently follows, that a peace with France, in her present situation, must inevitably tend to confirm her conquests, to consolidate her government, to reanimate, in some degree, her drooping commerce, to moderate the intolerable exactions that weigh down her subjects, to extinguish internal dissensions, not only in France, but (by destroying the hope of regaining what has been wrested from them) in the conquered countries also; and, lastly, to unite in one body, by the force of custom, education, and necessity, so many nations, differing so widely in their manners, politics, and religion.—Europe (I confine myself to the continent) has only three powers which can be opposed to France: these three powers are Austria, Prussia, and Russia.—Austria contains, at the highest calculation, nineteen millions of inhabitants, viz.

When we consider the state of population of that part of Poland united to Prussia, it is impossible to reckon it at more than 2,500,000; making a total of 7,000,000.

As to the population of Russia, the vast distance at which they are placed from the scene of our present inquiry, prevents us from including the numerous hordes inhabiting the immense deserts which extend beyond the Don, Moscow, the Lake of Ozero, the Ilmen, and the Neva: the provinces on this side of those boundaries contain from twelve to fourteen millions of inhabitants. We will say from 14 to	15,000,000

The actual population of these three states united, is, therefore, inferior to the French empire. What would it then be, if to the latter were added the population of Southern Italy? It would not amount to more than two thirds; and it is worthy of observation, that it is of a nature much less disposable, since it is scattered over an extent of country nearly four times as large as France.—The addition of the kingdoms of the north, and the northern states of Germany, would by no means compensate for this vast inequality.

The soil of Austria is, generally speaking, good; of Prussia, indifferent; and of Russia, bad. The personal and pecuniary riches of the three states, taken together, are not considerable; but England, by a union with them, would compensate for this disadvantage.—Austria and Prussia are situated between France and Russia; and the distance of the two last-mentioned powers from each other is so great, that it is scarcely possible for them to be at variance, without the mediation of both the former: Russia, therefore, can never have so lively an interest in a war of this nature as the other two powers. Besides this, her great distance from the scene of action will ever prevent her from interfering, but as an auxiliary, and with a relatively inconsiderable portion of her disposable forces. Her revenues will not permit her to maintain her armies out of her own territories; and the immense trains by which those armies are followed, added to a defective discipline, and a total want of military administration, would speedily exhaust the countries through which they would have to pass. Now, from the distance and the defensive power of France, the consumption would necessarily fall on the subjects of the two other allied powers, and the most brilliant victories of the armies of the league would not procure them an entrance into the German territories, condemned to a passive neutrality, till after the French had either exhausted or secured their resources.

The Prussian army is, indeed, numerous and well disciplined; but in spite of the most rigid economy it absorbs, even in time of peace, more than one half of the revenue of the state. The Prussian government, sparing of its expenses, and drawing from its subjects a revenue greater, in proportion, than that of Austria, can, nevertheless, barely maintain its peace establishment: add to this that it has no credit. Where, then, would it be able to find resources for a war of so serious a nature; a war, on the success of which would depend its very existence as a nation?—In every point of view is Austria superior to these two powers. A fertile soil procures, at a moderate rate, a plentiful subsistence to her armies; her revenues are more extensive, and her people better treated. The subjects of this monarchy are happy, united, in general, by the same religion, and attached for centuries to the family and the person of their sovereign; and though her armies have been dreadfully thinned by so many years of war, Austria must still be considered as the principal bulwark of the expiring liberties of Europe: and I hesitate not to assert, that she could, to preserve those liberties, still call forth more effectual strength than both the other powers united. Hitherto I have considered the three great powers of Europe as cordially united, from the principle of self-preservation. But even admitting this supposition, what delays must inevitably take place in the formation of projects! what crosses and difficulties must attend the execution of them! While one man resolves and orders at Paris, in the same moment, without any other trammels than those of physical possibility; while his orders are dispatched on all sides, with the rapidity of lightning, and are no sooner received than executed; the three sovereigns, fettered by a thousand ceremonies, must separately deliberate at Vienna, at Berlin, and at Petersburg; must communicate the result of those deliberations to each other, and agree upon a definitive plan of operation. To the above may also be added, the difficulties in the execution, arising from the rivalry of the sovereigns, as well as of their generals; the reciprocal antipathy of the nations composing the different armies; the impossibility of obtaining, at a given period, the necessary concurrence of means, prepared by independent powers, situated at so great a distance from each other: and the necessity of recurring, in times of great urgency, to the separate resources of the confederacy, all of which would inevitably tend to weaken that unanimity of co-operation, which could alone crown their exertions with the desired success.

The Empire of Germany, &c. &c.

That Austria, undiminished in her power and her influence, is absolutely necessary to the preservation of the liberty and happiness of Europe, has been most amply proved by the progress of the war, which the republican French have, for the last ten years, been carrying on against that liberty and that happiness, and which, every time that Austria has been compelled to lay down her arms, has enslaved some state or other of this now subjugated quarter of the world. Indeed, this power, in the hands of the illustrious house by which it is, as yet, possessed, has, for ages, been the guardian of Europe; and, as to Germany in particular, a bare reference to its history will convince us, that, since the middle of the sixteenth century, there has been no event, which has weakened the imperial power, and which has not, at the same time, overthrown several of the co-estates. While Charles V. was engaged in a struggle against the united efforts of France, the Ottoman empire, and a part of the princes of Germany, Henry the 2nd seized the bishoprics of Metz, Toul, and Verdun. The thirty years war, occasioned by the refractory ambition of the protestant princes, assisted by France, England, Sweden, and incidentally by the Turks, severed Alsace from the Germanic body, transferred several of its states to the king of Sweden, and entirely destroyed the ecclesiastical principalities of the north. In these later and still more unfortunate times, the voluntary separation of the king of Prussia, and the general defection of the states of the north of Germany, have, finally, robbed the empire of all the immense possessions which it still retained on the left bank of the Rhine, and has completed the destruction of the sovereignty of all the ecclesiastical princes, and, with very few exceptions, of the imperial cities.—Seeing, then, that the Austrian monarchy is the principal bulwark of the freedom and independence of Europe in general, and of the Germanic Body in particular, and that the cause of his imperial and royal majesty is become the common cause of every European, of whatever nation, who wishes to avoid that insupportable yoke which an upstart of yesterday is preparing for him, it behoves each individual to endeavour to form a correct opinion of the tendency of the present proceedings in the empire, to consider well their dangerous tendency, to inquire what means of salvation there are remaining, and to lend, while yet there is hope, the utmost efforts of his hand and his heart in support of the cause of Austria, of justice, and of the freedom, the independence, the honour, and the happiness of nations.—The emperor has been treated by France, and (under her malignant influence) by Prussia, and by the princes dependent thereon, with less ceremony and respect, than the most petty baron of the empire would have received at the hands of his imperial majesty himself. France and Prussia (for, in reality, Russia has had little to do with the matter), by the means of a printed paper, and, which is still more unbearable, through the channel of a French gazette, have communicated a plan of partition of the states of the empire, prohibiting, at the same time, all remonstrances, and even discussion, on the part of those whose dominions are thus to be partitioned; they have suppressed several of the first constitutional dignities of the empire; they have created new ones; they have, without either right or reason, and guided merely by their rapacity, their insolence, and their caprice, seized, for themselves, the states of the unfortunate sovereigns, whom, to make use of a modern phrase, they have cashiered, or have parcelled out those states, together with their inhabitants, amongst other princes, by way of compensation to these latter for losses with which the dispossessed sovereigns had nothing to do, and which, besides, were in general no more than a just punishment for the weakness or the treachery by which those, who had experienced losses, had abandoned or betrayed their common country to its most mortal foe. The mere circulation of a plan like this, was at once an act of violence and insult against the Germanic body, an outrage upon his imperial majesty, and an evident infraction of his rights, as the first and most considerable of the co-estates, as the head of the two first colleges (of the electoral college, as king of Bohemia, and of the college of princes as arch-duke of Austria), and as also the head of the empire itself, in virtue of which last character, it is well known, that he has a deciding voice as to all the resolutions passed by the colleges, which resolutions are nothing more than the constitutional expression of the wishes of the co-estates of the empire, and not laws of the Germanic body, until the emperor has given them his assent. It is also well known, that it is the emperor alone who legally can, and who ought, to create any new dignity in the Germanic body. Such a creation, in favour of a state, may, indeed become an object of recommendation, on the part of those powers, who may take an interest therein; but, it never can be regarded as a fit object for the deliberations of the diet, which, though it may remonstrate against any new creation that infringes against the rights of the co-estates, is totally incompetent to the granting, or even the proposing, of favours such as I am here speaking of, the prerogative of doing which is, by the laws and usages of the empire, placed exclusively in the hands of its chief.—So universal is the recognition of these principles, so strongly are they implanted in the minds of thinking men, in every part of Europe, that notwithstanding Tuscany had been erected into a kingdom, by the arrogant will of Buonaparté, even after this example of almost inconceivable outrage, the plan of indemnities, the new list of electors created by the successor of Barras, with precisely the same formalities that accompany his gift of a musket or drum-stick of honour, that is to say, by a simple notification of the fact in a French gazette called the Moniteur; in spite of the example of Tuscany, this last stretch of insolent authority did produce a general feeling of indignation.—But Prussia was not contented with proposing and circulating, through a vehicle so extraordinary, a project whereby she shares a considerable part of Germany with the creatures of Buonaparté, as ready as herself to abandon their country to the common enemy, in the hope of participating in a share of the spoil, as ardently desirous of invading those friendly states, in which their present sovereigns have all, without exception, rights more ancient and more just, than those of the king of Prussia over a great portion of the monstrous amalgamation of states, acquired by every possible means, composing what is denominated the Prussian monarchy*. She has not been contented

of his being a religieux. He, however, quieted his scruples by renouncing both his religion and the order. The sovereignty passed into his family, and, of course, became temporal by his abjuration. A zeal for the reform of abuses in the catholic religion, and a desire to restore it to its primitive purity, have peculiarly characterized the house of Brandenburg. These pious motives have been crowned with their reward in this world, and have secured it the possessions of the principalities of Magdeburg and Halberstadt; two bishopricks in which the princes of this house were either bishops or governors when they were secularized.—The system of expectancies has been another source of aggrandisement for the house of Brandenburg. By this means it obtained at different periods, the duchy of Pomerania, and the principality of West Friesland, the sovereigns of which, undoubtedly, had no heirs. Objections were made, at the time, to the evident inequality in the reciprocity of these expectancies, and in the condition of the family of the two contracting parties. It was pretended that the fiefs of the empire, vacant by the defect of heirs or otherwise, devolved of course to the investiture of the emperor. It cannot be denied that such was then the established law of Europe, and of the German empire in particular. But there is no general rule without its exception; and probably the objections set up were merely specious.—The ancestors of the Great Frederick possessed, as vassals, some particular seigneuries in Silesia, and set up their claim to several others. The minority of Maria Theresa was favourable to the termination of this dispute. It was, in fact, settled to the entire satisfaction of Frederick; who from being a vassal duke over a small portion of Silesia, became sovereign prince and lord paramount of all this territory.—By the first partition of Poland, the abbey of Oliva fell into the hands of the king of Prussia. The abbot had various claims on the city of Dantzic; which claims, though feeble in the hands of an abbot, became so powerful when enforced by a monarch, that the free city of Dantzic, one of the Hanse-towns under the protectorship of Poland, became subject and manorial to the new abbot of Oliva. By this metamorphosis, the whole trade of Poland was dependant on Prussia: the north of Europe lost the freedom of its principal corn market; and since that time, a scarcity of provisions has been more frequently felt in the south than formerly.—The circumstances that led to the second and final partition of Poland, are well known. The Poles complained, to all Europe, of having been induced to change the form of government they had accepted under the guarantee of Russia, by promises which finally left them exposed to a power they were not able to resist, and which they had had the imprudence seriously to offend. Prussia, to put an end to the agonies of Poland, united herself with this power—and Poland shortly after disappeared from the list of nations!—This continued series of acquisitions, now increased by the plan of indemnities, has raised stepping stones for extending the edifice of the Prussian monarchy in every direction: towards Russia by the means of Memel; into the electorate of Saxony, by the possession of Coburg, Mansfield, and Erfurt; towards Hesse, by Paderborn and

* Historical sketch of the various acquisitions of the house of Brandenburg.—About the middle of the fifteenth century, Frederick, the sixth burgrave of Nuremburgh, purchased of the emperor Sigismund, the electorate of Brandenburg, and paid the purchase money with a sum lent him by the city of Nuremburgh. The loan is generally better known than the time of payment, which, however, has undoubtedly been made. But this is easily accounted for: the result of the loan, was the acquisition of a distinguished sovereignty; the result of the repayment was only a liquidation of former accounts between the city of Nuremburgh and its burgrave, and therefore of no importance to the other powers of Europe.—A century after, Albert de Brandenburg who had been elected grand master of eastern Prussia, by the order of knighthood who conquered that province, made a conscientious scruple of taking possession of this principality, on account in a great measure, of the plunderers themselves, viz. Bavaria, Brandenburg, Wirtemberg, and Hesse Cassel, to which may be added Mentz, whose future destiny is in the hands of the Prussian party, and whose reigning prince, the baron of Dalberg, is well known to be a creature of Prussia, and a disciple of the new philosophy. She has not waited till the commission appointed to settle the indemnities had commenced its sittings; until it had received the remonstrances of the devoted princes, and, shewing itself at least as humane as the hardened robber, who returns to the plundered traveller wherewith to proceed on his journey, had secured, out of their own personal effects, a comfortable subsistence to the unfortunate men who had suddenly been precipitated from grandeur and opulence to a state of the most abject misery; until the decision of the commission had been transmitted to the diet, and the chief of the empire had come to a resolution on the subject, far more effectual than any that has ever been taken by the Germanic body*, as if her individual desire for increasing her territory, countenanced by Buonaparté, were sufficient to create rights superior to all examination, Prussia and her allies have darted, like birds of prey, on the different states which they had previously carved and cut out for themselves. Nor have they respected the rights of the subject more than those of the sovereign; since in taking possession of these countries, no stipulations whatever were made for the preservation of the liberties of the former. Nay, to such a pitch was their rapacity carried, that villages have been seen bleeding under the respective pretensions of two branches of the same family, the Landgraves of Hesse-Cassel and of Hesse-

Eichsfeld; into Hanover, by Hildesheim; into Westphalia, which is now become a province of Prussia, and into Franconia which it divides with the elector of Bavaria. Nay, so great has been the foresight of the cabinet of Berlin, that by means of the expectancy of one or two abbeyes granted to the stadtholder, it has laid the foundation of future acquisitions in Swabia. And do not all the princes of Germany tremble? And how is it they are not convinced, that their re-union might be a means of turning to their advantage those local conveniences which are necessarily reciprocal?

* The circumstance of preventing so many sovereigns and proprietors from perishing, strictly speaking, with hunger, does not seem to have been an object of sufficient importance to be taken into consideration in the first sittings of the commission. The impartial deputies did, indeed, venture a few propositions on the subject. The deputy of the Teutonic order (acquainted, no doubt, with the dispositions of the majority of those to whom he was speaking) thought he had done wonders, in proposing that the plundered sovereigns should be permitted to keep a town house, and some of them a country one, with a few horses from their own stables into the bargain. It has been generally reported, that one of the indemnified princes opposed the sale which a plundered sovereign wishes to make of his own wines: his cellar, as well as his principality belongs most undoubtedly to the former, since the "envoy of God, from whom all property emanates," has assigned them to him. This circumstance took place shortly after the signing of the treaty of Lunéville.

Darmstadt.—If ever there was a formal, complete, and unprovoked revolt against the acknowledged authority of the emperor, it is surely this; for never did rapacity and injustice more openly shew themselves. At a moment when the peace of the empire was suddenly endangered by several of its members; when the established laws of the empire, as well as those of equity, were openly violated, the emperor could not withhold his powerful protection to the states soliciting it; he could not without acknowledging himself despoiled of the imperial dignity, abandon its functions in a moment of such pressing necessity. He could not, in short, without dishonour, tolerate or encourage by his silence, a conduct so directly opposite to the principles of equity, the laws of the empire, and the positive and indisputable rights of its supreme head.—But let us turn, for a moment, from the barbarity, injustice, and illegality of this transaction, to inquire into its immediate consequences, as far as regards the empire and its chief.—The king of Prussia, previous to these new acquisitions, bordered on the Austrian dominions, from the conflux of the Bug and the Narew to Lusatia; an extent of more than 400 English miles. By the usurpation of Eichsfeld, Mulhausen, and the country of Erfurt, he communicates from Halberstadt with the states of Franconia on one side, and by the bishoprick of Fulda, which he has obtained for his protégé the prince of Nassau-Dillenburg, on the other, with the new states of his ally the elector of Bavaria, with whose prejudices against the house of Austria we are already well acquainted.—By this new disposition of his states, the king of Prussia surrounds more than three-fourths of the electoral and ducal possessions of the house of Saxony; and when we consider that in the center of Lusatia he possesses Coburg, that the whole of the frontier of Saxony towards Prussia is open, while his frontier towards Bohemia can be protected against Austria (supposing her engaged in a war against the Prussian league) by the standing army of the elector of Saxony, we shall be convinced that this prince cannot, without subjecting himself to the most imminent danger, preserve in that case the neutrality so essential to his interests, and, consequently, that the king of Prussia will force the states of Saxony into the league against the house of Austria.—But her communication with Bavaria will prove infinitely more fatal to his imperial majesty: this circumstance places all the forces of Franconia, Bavaria, and of Upper Swabia, at the disposal of Prussia. It lays open the whole of the frontier of Bohemia, Upper Austria, the Tyrol, and the Vorarlberg, from Egra to the Rhine and the Lake of Constance. Henceforth Austria, menaced by the Prussian league from the mouth of the Narew to Switzerland, will not as hitherto be able to take the field with advantage in Bavaria, and the Margraviates of Franconia: these countries will, in future, be defended by a force far more considerable than the junction of the old Bavarian army to the handful of troops kept up by the king of Prussia in his Margraviates. The country of Hesse-Cassel and Fulda, bordering towards the north, on the great body of Prussian states, and almost surrounded by the Prussian possessions of Eichsfeld, Corvey, and Paderborn, are evidently in the power of Prussia, and can only be considered as vassals of that monarchy.—Even the possessions of the houses of Hanover and Brunswick are not less subject to the encroachments of Prussia; for by the seizure of the bishopric of Hildesheim, the king of Prussia possesses a standing army in the center of that country, within a day's march of the capital of Hanover and Brunswick. He surrounds them on the east by Alt-Marck and the principalities of Magdeburg and Halberstadt; on the south by Eichsfeld, and, in case of necessity, by his vassal the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; and lastly, on the west by Corvey, Paderborn, Pymont, Ravensberg, Minden, and the bishopric of Munster. These states then, of so much importance both from their magnitude and the exalted rank of the sovereign to whom they belong, are completely in the power of the Prussian monarchy, and are already treated as conquered countries: since France and Prussia have disposed, without deigning to consult him, of the claims of the Elector of Hanover in Bremen, Hamburg, Hildesheim, Corvey, his bailiwick of Vildhausen and of the county of Altenkerchin. This powerful sovereign has not even been invited to the commission appointed to settle the indemnities, although his claim to a seat is stronger than that of any other prince, not only from his high rank and power, but more particularly because having no personal interest in the indemnities, he would, on that account, have been better able to decide with impartiality.—Westphalia, almost entirely occupied by the king of Prussia, and by princes without power and without protection, is to all intents and purposes a Prussian province. Swedish Pomerania and the Mecklenburgh, nearly hemmed in by Prussian states, and out of the reach of every sort of succour, will always be under the necessity of receiving whatever impulse the cabinet of Berlin may be pleased to give them. Thus, if we except the states of Baden and Wirtemberg, with those of a few petty princes on the banks of the Rhine, where the influence of France will be equal if not superior to that of Prussia, it follows, from the correct enumeration just given, that the cabinet of Berlin will, in the course of time, by firmness towards France and good faith towards its allies and co-estates, completely succeed in rendering the whole of the states of Germany dependant upon it, and in uniting them, by fear as well as interest, against the emperor of Germany. On every occasion, too, when it may be in contemplation to direct the forces of the empire against its chief, Baden and Wirtemberg will enter into the confederacy, through the influence of France, who will never consider herself secure in the universal empire to which she aspires, till the day arrives when she shall have succeeded in laying the power of Austria in the dust.—From the above view of the subject, the vast pains taken by France and Prussia to secure a majority of votes in the electoral college, and to refuse a seat to the grand duke of Tuscany, whose estates are so much superior to those of Wirtemberg, Hesse-Cassel, and Baden, may be considered as altogether superfluous: for the imperial dignity, hitherto so exalted, and to which the most powerful monarchs of Europe voluntarily gave precedence, will henceforth, to the chief of the house of Austria, be little more than a source of litigations and of insults, from a confederacy which can only be considered as a body offensively leagued against its nominal chief. Whatever step the emperor of Germany may adopt, with regard to this dignity, it is evident, that the electors of Brandenburg, Bavaria, Baden, Wirtemberg, Hesse-Cassel, nay, the ridiculous elector of Aschaffenburg, and probably those of Hanover and Saxony, will either vote against the house of Austria, or conter upon it the imperial dignity under certain restrictions, which will render the emperor a mere crowned phantom, and a passive spectator of the resolutions dictated by Prussia to the diet. I have said, the ridiculous elector of Aschaffenburg: * for what can possibly be more ridiculous than a principal elector almost without subjects, with the town of Aschaffenburg for a capital, and possessions (Ratisbon and Wetzlar) at the distance of 100 leagues from each other, the one shut up in the center of Bavaria, and the other in Hesse? Who is not convinced that this elector can have no will but that of Prussia, and that on the very day in which he dared to manifest a contrary disposition, his person, his petty estates, and his archives would immediately fall into the hands of the anti-imperial party? And yet this impotent and dependant condition is the very motive that will hereafter induce the enemies of the emperor to invest this elector with great power and authority, either as arch-chancellor or catholic primate of the empire; secure in the assurance that a power entirely under their controul could at any time be directed to the detriment of the emperor. And thus, this new electorate, in appearance so insignificant, is, in reality, an artful combination against the imperial authority. I return to the consequences of the proposed indemnities. At the first view, they appear to bear only upon the princes, senates, and abbies which have been destroyed; while, in reality, the loss falls upon the emperor, the catholic sovereigns, the immediate nobility, and the subjects of these dif-

* There is a remarkable clause in the creation of this same elector of Aschaffenburg; I mean that by which Prussia cuts off from the jurisdiction assigned to the new elector, as catholic primate of Germany, the territories of Erlurt and Eichsfeld, the sovereignty of which countries she has reserved to herself. Is not this announcing, in so many words, that what belongs to the elector of Brandenburg in the empire is no longer a portion of the empire? This clause is dictated in the same spirit as that in the peace of Dresden in 1745, by which Frederick the second, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the diet, caused Silesia to be ceded to him as a sovereignty independent of the empire; though in quality of fief of Bohemia it undoubtedly formed a part of it. They have both the same tendency as the celebrated German association (Fürstenbund) whose pretended object was to preserve the empire from the too formidable preponderancy of its chief, but whose real object was to detach from the empire all the states possessed by Prussia and the princes who were parties in this association, and consequently to destroy the empire. It is not surprising that this league should have found so many advocates in France. A plan more calculated to serve the interests of that formidable and ambitious neighbour could not have been devised. Could Frederick the second have foreseen the enormous aggrandisement of France, it is highly probable that he would have been the first to strengthen the ties of the Germanic body. His successor, it is to be feared, will shortly be sensible of the fatal effects of this deceitful policy.

ferent states. It is well known, that the emperor legally exercised a far greater authority over the bishoprics, prelaties and imperial towns, than he did over the other states: that he generally enjoyed their concurrence in as much as he was their natural and constant protector; and that the attachment of this class of states to the head of the empire, contributed in a great measure, to increase that dignity and that power, which are always necessary to protect the empire abroad and maintain it in tranquillity at home. Now by the proposed plan of indemnities, not only does the emperor lose all the lawful influence enjoyed over these different states; not only does this influence pass over intire to princes inimical to, and jealous of the emperor; but, in addition to all this, these princes acquire the possession of the domains, the present property, the revenues, in a word, all the resources, civil, political and military, of these several countries, with the well-founded hope of being able to direct them at will to the injury of the chief of the empire. This general consideration of the subject will appear still clearer, from the following detail.—Each of the deposed princes had a vote, either in the electoral college, or in the college of princes. As these votes were generally on the same side as the private vote of the emperor, in the quality of co-estate, they secured him, as emperor, the preponderancy necessary for governing with dignity and effect. These votes, in supporting the personal resolves of the emperor by majority of suffrages, had also the double advantage of making his will, as emperor, quadrate with the legal will of the colleges. Consequently, they relieved him from the critical situation into which the chief of the empire would be placed, in being obliged to overthrow, by his imperial vote, the resolutions entered into by a majority of the colleges. I have termed this situation critical, because it is in reality a commencement of hostilities between the empire and its chief, capable of involving the confederacy in a civil war. By means of the new plan of indemnities, all these votes will immediately pass to the anti-imperial league, and consequently secure it a preponderancy, which will necessarily place the emperor in this same critical situation, of which the least fatal consequences will be, to render ineffectual the forces of the empire, and to set the members of the colleges at variance with their chief.—Another consideration, not less powerful, is the tendency of this new system to enfeeble the armies of Austria. All her regiments of German infantry contained no inconsiderable number of foreigners: there is even an order of the council of war, limiting the number of these foreigners to one-third; we may, therefore, safely estimate them at a fifth. Supposing, then, that only half the imperial regiments admit foreign troops, and that the total of this army is 300,000, Austria will thereby lose a supply of 30,000 men; for she only recruited in the ecclesiastical states or imperial towns, all of which are now either suppressed, or hemmed in by states unfriendly to the augmentation of the Austrian army. And not only does the emperor lose this supply of 30,000 men, but it passes entire to the indemnified princes; that is to say, to the disposal of France against the emperor.—The electorates and bishoprics overturned by the new system of indemnities were noble dependencies, open alike to the house of Austria, as to the houses of Bavaria, Saxony, and the other great catholic families of Germany, to which the protestant princes had so much the less claim, as they had previously seized, in perpetuity, all the possessions of this nature situated in the protestant countries. On what principle of justice can possession be transferred to these princes which are incontestably the property of others? And why will the house of Austria and the other catholic houses furnish the king of Prussia, at their own expense, with indemnities, when he has voluntarily given up a small territory beyond the Rhine, that he might be furnished with a pretext for obtaining another on this side, six times as extensive, and much more convenient than the one he abandoned? The same reasoning applies with equal force to the immediate nobility of the empire, and to the inferior classes of the citizens of the catholic states, all of whom, under fixed regulations, possessed incontestible and long established claims to the enjoyment of the prelaties, chapters, abbeyes, convents and other possessions usurped by the princes claiming indemnities. The same may be also said of the imperial towns; which, as such, enjoyed, legitimately and according to the established laws of the German empire, possessions, and civil and political rights, to which they had as just a claim as the king of Prussia to Berlin, or the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel to the town bearing that name. In short, none of these bishops, prelates, chapters and imperial towns, ever entered into any compromise by which they agreed to deprive themselves of their lawful possessions, with a view of indemnifying the king of Prussia, the landgraves of Hesse-Cassel and Darmstadt, the duke of Wirtemberg and the margrave of Baden, for losses which I will venture to declare voluntary; for I ask any honest man, whether the German empire would have been thus mutilated, whether the wresting of what has escaped the fury of the arms of France would now be a question of consideration, if the sovereigns above mentioned had sincerely employed their combined forces for the defence of the empire, and for the prosecution of an unprovoked war, and had seconded the exertions of his imperial majesty in favour of their common country, of that German country so patriotically invoked in the manifestoes of Prussia, calling upon all the states of the empire to arm against the aggressions of France?—No one can possibly doubt, that Prussia, at the moment when the cabinet of Berlin signed, on the 5th of April, 1795, the ever to be lamented treaty of Basle, did not possess the means of defending or of recovering all her possessions on the other side of the Rhine. Her army, thanks to the prudent policy of her generals, was intire; and so were her resources, thanks to the £1,400,000 sterling received from England for her brilliant co-operation in the campaign of 1794, to the immense sums drawn from Holland under the same pretext, and to the treasure extorted from Germany, to defray the expenses of the siege of Mentz. The directory itself, happy in purchasing, at so low a rate,

* Of this there can be no doubt: and in the course of a very few years, we also shall have reason to cry out, "and if we had been willing to devote to the war what we have voted for a peace establishment, and a trifle more, we should still be in possession of all we have given up!" T.

the neutrality of an enemy so powerful as Prussia, would, most gladly, have restored to her the countries of the Guelders and the Meurs. But this was not exactly the object of the Prussian cabinet. It was necessary to suffer an apparent loss, that she might be furnished with a pretext, of some sort or other, for the exorbitant indemnities which were even then stipulated for, and founded upon the overthrow (foreseen six years before it took place) of the Germanic body; of which the king of Prussia was one of the principal co-estates and assumed the title of protector. His open enmity to the body would have been much less fatal than such a line of conduct: for the empire, betrayed by one of its members, would either have redoubled its efforts and triumphed under its chief, or, seeing the impossibility of resistance, have submitted to necessity, and thereby prevented the effusion of those torrents of blood, which, since the year 1795, have deluged all Europe. On what heads will divine justice pour down this blood, which calls so loudly for vengeance!—The empire, all Europe, well know to what advantage Prussia has turned the state of repose in which she was left by the treaty of Basle. While the emperor was supporting, almost single handed, the pressure of the French arms, while he was generously devoting himself to the preservation of that empire, of which he has been basely represented as a chief dangerous from his power and ambition, the government of Prussia, ever actuated by that tender solicitude for the German confederacy, detached those princes who could alone have assisted in saving it, and immortalized his name by his glorious victories over the town of Nuremberg and the Teutonic Order, which he deprived of the grand bailiwick of Ollingen.—But it is principally upon the subject of these suppressed states, that the unjust system of plunder weighs most heavily. The greater part of them enjoyed civil privileges, more exclusive than those of the princes under whose dominion they are intended to be transferred. They were generally exempted from military conscription, or, at least, that conscription was more limited. The prince, always checked by a regency invested with legal authority, could impose no fresh taxes: the public revenues did not go to enrich a distant capital, but were all expended in the country whereon they were raised: the domainial possessions of these princes were proportionably of greater extent, because they had never been alienated; but now the revenues of these domains, which from their nature enter into the class of private possessions, will, for the greater part, be carried out of the country in which they are raised. The different employments, and the wages paid for such employments, were in the hands of the inhabitants of the country, and always consumed on the spot. In short, the confiscation of all these ecclesiastical establishments, ceded to princes, for the greater part protestant, or notoriously infected with the principles of the new philosophy, is an outrage against the catholic religion, the expense of supporting which was defrayed by them, and which is still the most ancient, as well as most general religion throughout Germany: it is a glaring act of injustice towards the present and future possessors, a robbery without pretext or necessity, and even without an example, except in the good times, when those pious personages, Lameth and Brissot, boasted of bringing back the church to the apostolic period, and when the Condorcets, the Marats, and the Robespierres restored the golden age to France! —I well know, that to this assertion will be opposed the secularizations made in favour of the protestants, by the treaty of Westphalia; but these secularizations were formed on a principle which has no affinity whatever to the present usurpations. The protestant states having changed their religion, the religious endowments were to be applied to the one they had embraced, and the surplus, if any, was to pass over to the domains of the state. But what connexion has this principle with the point in question? Would it not be as just and as proper for Buonaparté and the king of Prussia (I beg the king of Prussia pardon for naming him after Buonaparté, but it is not my fault if he chuses to be one of his followers) to include the bishoprics, chapters, and other benefices of the English church, in the mass of what they are pleased to call indemnities?—It must then be acknowledged, that this pretended plan of indemnities, is a system of plunder, as contrary to the established laws of the empire, as to those of natural equity; that it is to be carried into execution by measures as cruel as they are unconstitutional; that it will prove fatal to the plundered princes and states; unjust to the emperor, whom it despoils of his positive and acknowledged rights of protection and supremacy over these states; unjust to the sovereign catholic houses, to the immediate nobility, and to all classes of the inhabitants of these catholic countries, who thereby lose their present and future claims on the usurped places and property; and fatal and unjust to the great mass of the subjects of these countries, inasmuch as it weakens their civil rights, by leaving them at the mercy of the new sovereigns; impoverishes them, by sending to a distance the produce of their soil and industry, and robs them of their religion, by confiscating the endowments destined for the support of it; finally, (and it is here that the subject of the indemnities is connected with the general interests of Europe) that this plan is above all fatal both to the emperor and the empire: to the emperor, whom it deprives of the weight and consideration, which, for the defence of the empire and the support of its internal tranquillity, he derived from his constitutional influence over the suppressed states, to confer them on princes either enemies to, or jealous of the chief of the empire: to the empire, which thereby loses its natural protector, to be swallowed up in the inevitable dissensions of princes, become nearly independent, and freed from the salutary tie which united them to the empire, and in various respects to the emperor himself.—The result of these important truths is, that his imperial and royal majesty, for the preservation of his own rights and those of the empire of which he is chief, for the protection of the sovereigns so unjustly plundered, and for the security of the rights and properties of their subjects, is loudly called upon to oppose with all his might, and by every means in his power, the execution of this unjust and fatal system; that he ought not only to have the good wishes of all the states of the empire which have not taken an active part in this iniquitous transaction, but the good wishes and the support of all the lawful sovereigns, who cannot sanction by their inactivity, much less by their concurrence, a system of usurpation that saps the authority of all sovereigns, to its foundation, that roots out the attachment of the subject, and that is, in every respect, favorable to the ambitious views of a man, who is desirous that every throne should be filled by usurpers like himself. The enemy the most formidable, the object the most odious to this man is a legitimate prince: the bare idea of legitimate authority is a spectre carrying terror to his soul, through the redoubled guards in which he is incased. The day on which he should behold none but usurpers on the throne, that day would be to him, the accomplishment of all his wishes: become, by the title of his possession, the equal of all sovereigns, he would then be their superior in power; from the precarious situation of a rebel, he would have attained the supremacy of the universe. * If it is evident, that the new division of the German empire unites, against the emperor, the forces of the states of Germany, destined formerly to act in concert with his own forces, and under his constitutional direction, against the enemies of the empire; if it is evident that opposition of forces destroys them in whole or in part; if, in short, the sovereigns of Europe reflect, that the tendency of the plan of indemnities is to weaken the means still left to the monarch of Austria, to restrain and counterbalance the power that openly threatens their independence, they must feel that sound policy and their private interests, unite with the higher considerations of equity and the support of social order, in calling upon them to support the emperor in the great cause in which he is engaged. —If it were possible to set limits to the career of injustice; if ambition, like war, had its established laws; † it would seem that, even admitting the principle “that it is fair to indemnify oneself, for what has been lost, at the expense of a third person innocent of that loss, and, who even lent his assistance to prevent it”—It would seem, I say, that the equivalent sought for ought, at least, to be limited to the amount of what has really been lost, and that the conduct of those faithless mariners, who sink an empty vessel for the purpose of securing the insurance of an imaginary cargo, ought not to be imitated. It will be curious to observe how closely conformable the cupidity of Prussia and her associates has been to this principle of morality, which is certainly none of the most rigorous, and which consists in doing the least possible injustice, to obtain an object which is itself unjust; and with this view, I shall present my readers with a correct statement of the voluntary losses of the house of Brandenburg; and to compare them with the territories she has just taken possession of by force of arms.—The partiality of the author of a work intitled “La Monarchie Prussienne”—for Prussia, and his ridiculous antipathy to the house of Austria, are well known. This is what he says of the population of Gueldres,

* Here the author has dived into the very recesses of the head and heart of the first consul. Who, in fact, does not see that all his efforts tend principally to this object? T.
† But who that possesses a grain of common honesty can “admit” it for a moment? It can only be admitted by wretches, who having lost their all at the gaming table, or by other causes equally infamous, are desirous of recovering it on the high road, at the expense of their neighbours. T.

Meurs, and Cleves, situated, the two first intirely, and the latter in part, on the left side of the Rhine. He reckons the inhabitants of Gueldres at 46,942, of Meurs from 18 to 20,000, and the whole of Cleves at 92,000, of which number rather less than a third, or nearly 30,000, dwell on the left side of the Rhine; which makes the total from 95 to 97,000 souls.—In return for these countris, sold to France, the king of Prussia receives from the French, and takes from the German empire, the bishoprics of Hildersheim and Paderborn, more than one half of the bishopric of Munster, the countrys of Eichsfeld, and Erfurt, the abbeyes of Herforden, Elten, Quedlinburgh, Essen, Werden, and Cappenburgh, and the imperial towns of Mulhausen, Nordhausen, and Goslar, together with the expectancy of the bishopric of Fulda, and several other possessions in Swabia given to the house of Orange as an indemnity, for the loss of the stadtholdership and the domanial possessions of that house in the Pays-Bas.—I shall draw the value of these cessions, which the king of Prussia has taken to himself, from a work published at Berlin, in the month of May, 1801, * under the direction of the indemnified princes, and which cannot therefore be suspected of having exaggerated the population and revenue of the countrys, destined to be the reward of the German princes who sold the empire of Germany to France.

Spread over a territory entirely under the control of Prussia, and forming a population nearly six times as numerous as the possessions ceded to France. To make up for the insufficiency of this equivalent, she has secured to herself the expectancy of the indemnities given to the prince of Orange, containing nearly 100,000 inhabitants.—The houses of Baden, Wirtemburgh, Hesse-Cassel and Hesse-Darmstadt, have not been less favoured than that of Brandenburg. The following particulars will furnish a correct idea of their losses, collectively taken.—The house of Baden has lost a portion of the county of Sponheim, and a revenue of about 80,000 franks in possessions situated in Alsace and the Luxembourg.—The house of Wirtemberg has lost the county of Montbéliard, shut up between Alsace and Franche-Comté, containing, at most, from 9 to 10,000 souls; in Franche-Comté, the subject manors of Clémont, Flumont, Chatelot, Hericourt, the island upon the Doubs and Passavant, and some manors in Alsace, producing at the highest calculation an annual rent of 100,000 franks. The whole sovereignty of the three branches of the house of Hesse beyond the Rhine, consisted of the town of Saint Goar, the citadel of Rhinfels, and six or eight villages near the Rhine; together with the town and bailiwick of Pirmasens. I venture to affirm, that the population of the sovereign possessions of the three houses of Baden, Wirtemberg, and Hesse beyond the Rhine, did not amount to 35,000 inhabitants. The house of Hesse-Darmstadt possessed, it is true, as a subject, some lands in Alsace and Lorraine, producing about 300,000 franks annually: thus, for the loss of 55,000 subjects, and a rental of about 500,000 franks, these three houses have acquired.—The bishopricks of Constance, Spire, Strasburgh, Worms, and Basle, containing, together, according to the work above-quoted, 35,800 inhabitants: The provostship of Ellvangen, the abbey of Zwifalten, and the imperial towns contiguous to the dutchy of Wirtemberg; making an increase to this dutchy, of more than 100,000 souls, and 700,000 florins in manorial revenues, without reckoning future imposts:—The greatest and most valuable portion of the palatinate of the Rhine, situated upon the right bank of that river, containing 96,800 inhabitants:—The imperial towns of Offenburgh, Zell, Wimpffen, Biberach, Plundersdorf, Gegenbach, Überlingen, &c. the population of which exceeds 40,000 souls:—The abbey of Salmansweiler and Petershausen, with a great number of mediat abbey, 9,000 souls:—And, lastly, for the house of Hesse, the Duchy of Westphalia, containing 95,000 inhabitants, a number of Mentz bailiwicks, imperial towns, abbey, &c. so that we may safely assert, the collected amount of all these possessions, too numerous to be separately noticed, exceeds, in a ten-fold degree, the value of the real losses sustained by these three favoured houses. This vast disproportion between the pretended losses and the plundered indemnities, is so notorious, that even Buonaparté has not thought proper to dissemble it, however opposite it is to the principle laid down in the treaty of Luneville, for the regulation of these indemnities. Through his organ, Talleyrand, he has told his adulatory senate (a name more suitable to the new functions of that assembly, than conservatory) that “the house of Baden had, by its conduct towards France, acquired claims on its gratitude.” But are the deferences paid by a prince of the empire to the will of France, and the services rendered her when the empire was at war with her, to be rewarded at the expense of that very empire and of its chief? Many persons think that the just reward of such conduct, in a prince who could not, like the margrave of Baden, plead his own weakness and the strength of his enemy, would have been put under the ban of that empire which he would voluntarily have abandoned.—The plain statement just given, it controvertibly proves, as the “honest” Talleyrand has himself acknowledged, that this system of universal plunder had no object, but that of gratifying the princes who had seconded the views of France, by abandoning the German empire to its ravages; and, ultimately, according to the avowal of the same Talleyrand, to preserve the empire from the pretended usurpations of its chief; that is to say, to unite against the emperor, by the allurements of plunder, all the princes of the empire, who could be admitted to partake of the spoil, without diminishing their dependency on France. Who does not see, that the margrave of Baden, the duke of Wirtemberg, and the two houses of Hesse, must henceforth be subservient to the will of the French government, as long as that government remains what it now is, in form and in power? To these considerations of political interests may be added another indirect view; that of carrying the philosophical sect to which Buonaparté is so much attached, a step farther in the accomplishment of his favourite project, the destruction of the Catholic religion: but those who profess that religion are bound to support it, and those who do not profess it must, nevertheless, respect it, as being the most considerable religion in Europe, both from its antiquity and the number of its followers.—But the authors and abettors of the plan of indemnities ought, at least, to have begun by executing its ostensible object, and not by seizing to themselves and their creatures, the immense possessions destined for that purpose. Admitting the justice of the principle of the indemnities, such a step would have been a real act of distributive justice. The noble and disinterested manner in which the head of the house of Austria had stipulated for himself, without claiming any indemnities belonging to the princes, of whom he was the chief and protector; his rank, his power, his situation as principal contracting party in the treaty of Luneville, ought, surely, to have secured him a complete execution of the stipulations in that treaty immediately relating to his house, and consequently of the positive stipulation for a full and complete indemnity in favour of the grand duke of Tuscany, plundered of his states, in spite of his neutrality, by one of those strokes of despotism, which the great sovereigns of Europe ought never to have suffered. For the only reason adduced by Buonaparté for deposing the grand duke of Tuscany, in profound peace with him, was the peremptory one, that, “it was not for the general interest of Europe that a prince of the house of Austria should enjoy any possessions in Italy!” In short, it appears evident, that of all the princes who were to receive indemnities, the grand duke of Tuscany ought not to have been the only one, to whom a compensation was offered not half so valuable as the possessions of which he had been plundered, without any other declared motive than this pretended “general interest” of Europe; over which Buonaparté with his accustomed modesty, has constituted himself on this important occasion, sole and sovereign judge; but this will appear still more evident when it is known, as I shall prove hereafter, that this very compensation was at the expense of his imperial and royal majesty.—But, before I enter upon this detail, it will not be without its use, to point out the real motive for this outrage against the grand duke, so degrading to the sovereign dignity in general, and so offensive to the sovereigns of Europe in particular; for no one could possibly be the dupe of a pretence so completely absurd, and which the neutrality of the grand duke has so clearly demonstrated to be false. It is one of the most profound combinations of cunning and malignity. Buonaparté, in offering the grand duke of Tuscany a complete indemnity in Germany, placed his majesty, the emperor, in the cruel alternative of either leaving his own brother, and a powerful branch of his house, in the hands of the robbers, or of giving a sort of tacit, though involuntary and forced, consent to the destruction of the Germanic body. In short, by the very extent of the compensation stipulated for the grand duke, his own interests, and consequently those of the house of Austria, were placed in the direct opposition to the pretensions of the Germanic princes, leagued for the purpose of plundering their co-estates. A plan more completely calculated to second the ulterior projects of ambition of the French government could not have been devised.—To return to the compensation offered by France and Prussia to the grand duke. They consist, 1st. of the archbishoprick of Salzbourg* and the adjoining provostship of Berchtolsghaden, the one containing 225,000, the other 18,000 inhabitants: 2d. of part of the bishoprick of Passau, situate to the right of the Inn, and the left of Iltz, containing about 20,000 souls: 3d. of the two bishopricks of Brixen and Trent, with the exact population of which I am not acquainted, but, placed in the heart of the Alps, they can only be thinly peopled. We will, however, estimate them at 150,000 souls; that is to say, at two-thirds of the population of the archbishoprick of Salzbourg. The whole amount, therefore, does not exceed 420,000 souls, scattered over one of the least fertile countries of Europe, and extending nearly 500 miles over the Alps, from the lake of Guarda to Bohemia; besides this, Passau is separated from the rest of his possessions. In whatever point of view we examine the subject, how can this state be considered as a full, complete, and adequate indemnification for the grand duchy of Tuscany, containing more than one million, one hundred thousand inhabitants, situated in one of the finest and most fruitful spots on the face of the globe, communicating by its coasts and the port of Leghorn, with the rest of the universe, and carrying on an extensive commerce; finally, whose position in the centre of the inoffensive powers of Italy, placed it beyond the reach of the storms which so often agitate the other powers of Europe; storms to which a neutrality, prompted by her private interest and the general interests of commerce, rendered her a total stranger? How, after so glaring an infringement of an essential clause in the treaty of Luneville, a treaty to which the German princes claiming indemnities (unless in the person of their protector the emperor) were not parties, and to which they had no right to be parties, since nearly all of them had laid down their arms, and entered into separate treaties with France—How, I say, and with what face, can France and Prussia invoke this same treaty of Luneville, which so loudly accuses their malevolence and their perfidy? But leaving the interests of the grand duke, who had no share in this iniquitous treaty, entirely out of the question (since, not being at war with France he could not legally be deprived of his possessions, and may at any time reclaim Tuscany, or the equivalent promised him by the man who forced him to make the exchange), let us examine the system of indemnities as it regards the emperor. We shall find that the whole weight falls almost entirely upon his imperial majesty.—In the first place the two bishopricks of Trent and Brixen, though states of the empire, and enjoying a great portion of the rights attached to the sovereignty, have been, for the space of three hundred years, under the high protection of the head of the house of Austria, who, since the time of Charles the Fifth, and even prior to that period has enjoyed, without opposition from these states or from any sovereign, the power of employing his forces whenever necessary for the exercise of that high protection which he owes them as count of Tyrol. Justice compels me to remark, that the independence which the house of Austria in every other respect, has preserved to these two states, does infinite honour to its moderation; and if any one imagines that those states would have experienced the same moderation from the house of Brandenburg, had they bordered on its possessions, he has only to look for the traces of those states of a similar description, which had the misfortune to be contiguous to Prussia—they have all disappeared!—The above assertion is so evident, that the work I have already quoted, printed at Berlin in May 1801, and consequently under the direction of Prussia, in presenting a survey of all the ecclesiastical states of Germany which might serve as indemnities, has not even dared to include Trent and Brixen among the number; an evident proof, that they were looked upon, even at Berlin, as forming, in some respect, a part of the states of the archduke of Austria. Thus, then, is a third of the indemnities offered to the grand duke of Tuscany, taken from the territories of the archduke of Austria.—Nearly the same assertion may be made, with respect to the other portions of this pretended indemnity, viz. Salzburgh and Passau. For his majesty, the emperor, independently of his constitutional authority over these two states, as chief of the empire, possessed also a still greater influence over them, as sovereign of a powerful monarchy, by which they were nearly surrounded: the ties of patronage and protection existing between the emperor and these two states were such, that they could not prudently, nor without exposing themselves to the greatest inconvenience, vote in opposition to the interests of the house of Austria, and still less elude the execution of the legal resolutions of the diet, sanctioned by the chief of the empire. Thus, in all matters that concerned the empire, the head of the house of Austria could dispose of the political influence and the military forces of these four states, as if he had been their direct sovereign. This marked influence of the house of Austria over some of the states of the empire, is not peculiar to that power, all the world knows the influence exercised by Prussia over most of the states* of the north of Germany, and even over those states, which from their extent and power, from their rank in the empire, and from the exalted rank of their sovereign (the elector of Hanover) ought only to be subordinate to the supreme and constitutional authority of the German empire; it knows also the use she made of it to detach from the defence of the common country, a considerable portion of the empire, in order to facilitate an overthrow which was to secure it so vast an aggrandizement; and finally, it knows, that the very states whose proscription was decreed by the treaty of Basle, have contributed, under the pretext of maintaining the neutrality that was to bring on their overthrow, to the support of the Prussian army, called the army of observation. — It was not enough for France and Prussia to plunder the chief of the house of Austria of those valuable and undoubted rights which he enjoyed over the states of the grand duke of Tuscany. These two governments have carried their arrogance so far as to command the emperor, by that new vehicle of diplomatic communication, invented by Buonaparté, the Moniteur, to transfer to the elector of Bavaria certain possessions situate to the right of the Inn, and have peremptorily fixed the term of 60 days for the completion of their supreme will. — In the same insolent manner did they treat his Britannic majesty, by disposing of his bailiwick of Vildhausen, his county of Altenkirchen, and his possessional rights in the cities of Bremen and Hamburg, without deigning to inform him but through the medium of the consular gazette. The illustrious emperors of the house of Brunswick, who reigned over Germany 500 years before a branch of the house of Prussia filled the insignificant office of burgrave of Nuremburgh, little imagined that their descendants would one day experience so serious an insult! — So much arrogance, so daring an outrage against the essential principles of sovereignty, ought to have united all sovereigns against such a procedure: and it is impossible that his majesty, the emperor of Russia, whose distinguished character is a religious regard for the principles of justice, even towards those over whom he possesses absolute authority, should not have been deceived as to the nature of these transactions; for how could he otherwise have afforded the sanction of his high approbation to a plan, which no less attacks his own sovereignty, than that of the two monarchs of whom I have just spoken! — This refusal to afford the grand duke the full amount of the compensations assigned him 18 months ago, cannot arise from a deficiency of the territories allotted for the indemnities. The work printed at Berlin, which I have already quoted, estimates the whole of the ecclesiastical states on the right side of the Rhine at 2,399,118 inhabitants, without including the states of Trent and Brixen. To which, if we add nearly the whole of the imperial towns (for six only provisionally escaped the general proscription) we shall have a population of about three million souls. Such is the mass of states to be entirely withdrawn from their allegiance to the emperor, and divided between princes openly aspiring at independence, and consequently inimical to the head of the empire. Three millions of men torn from the defence of the empire, and placed at the disposal of France, whenever she is inclined to attack it! Is it feared, then, that Europe is crumbling into ruins too slowly? And is it necessary to hasten its demolition? — Let us now compare this mass of states with those which have been conquered by France. For this purpose, I shall make an extract from the report of citizen Roberjot, sent, by the national convention, as commissary into the countries which had recently been conquered. The object of this report was to induce the convention to adopt the Rhine for the boundary of France: — “The conquered countries may be divided into two zones, one bounded by the Rhine and the Meuse, the other by the Meuse and the ocean. The country between the Rhine and the Meuse contains, &c.” (Here follows a correct enumeration of the states included between these two rivers.) “The first zone contains a surface of 1,130 square leagues, and a population of 1,807,000 souls.” (Here follows a list of the principal states of the zone.) — From this detail it results, that if we deduct the Austrian and ecclesiastical possessions, together with the imperial towns, for all which no indemnities have been allotted, and whose population exceeds 710,000 inhabitants, there will remain, at most, 1,100,000 souls, which, added to nearly an equal number of inhabitants in Tuscany, make a total of 2,200,000 subjects, while the funds set apart for the equivalents were calculated for three million. Thus, then, there is not even the shadow of an excuse for this violation of the treaty of Luneville, and, probably, the very want of all excuse, gives it additional claims to the approbation of Buonaparté and his majesty of Prussia; inasmuch as it adds insult to the numerous injuries already heaped on the house of Austria. A curious article on this head has lately appeared in the Mercur de France: this Mercur is published under the auspices, and even under the direction of Lucien Buonaparté*. — I shall just observe by the

* It was by virtue of this influence, and under its special protection, that the city of Hamburg, enjoying a strict neutrality, and in all probability, contributing dearly its contingency to the army of observation, paid several millions of florins to the French government. It was entirely owing to the pacification of Russia that this same city was not called on to defray the expences of the campaign of the Danes against the commerce of Germany, which was principally carried on through Hamburg.

* Extract from The Mercur de France, No. 69, year 11, p. 250. — “Germany has, for centuries past, presented the two-fold aspect of an immense empire, and of a vast federative republic. The peace of Westphalia tended to strengthen the republican portion of its constitution, by diminishing the power and influence of its chief. The plan now presented by the mediating powers has certainly the same tendency.” — Yes, most certainly, I have proved that this “Plan” was destructive of both. It therefore fully answers the object, here avowed by the French government. — “If the necessity of the interposition of the two mediating powers could have been called in question, nothing more would have been necessary to have clearly proved it, than the multitude of demands and pretensions which have been set up, and which can only be settled by an irresistible power, such as the union of France and Russia presents.” — This irresistible power is an interference of the same nature as that adopted by Buonaparté, with respect to the independence of Switzerland. — “The letters from Ratisbon say, that that town is filled with demandants, complainants, and claimants, driven some by want, and others by avarice; that there is not a prince nor a town that has not presented memorials; that even the secularized persons resort thither, and that, in passing through the midst of them, a person would imagine himself in the shades, if all these dead persons did not demand a lengthened existence.” — This pleasant amidst shades of those who have been killed, really discovers great magnanimity. — “It was easy to fore-

way, that this same report of citizen Roberjot corroborates the amount of the population which we see that their possessions would be an object of cupidity to their neighbours; and, as the empire is made up of their neighbours, it is evident, that it it had been left to itself, the disputes about the division would have been endless, or that the eagles would have acted the part of the lion."—And who doubts, that it was left for that power which had given birth to these endless disputes, to put an end to them by its mediation? Here is the first peck at the Prussian eagle.—"The term of two months, fixed upon by France and Russia,—a term sufficient, I conceive, for us Frenchmen to conclude treaties of peace with all the powers of Europe,—must have appeared prodigiously short at Ratisbon, for an arrangement in some sort merely domestic."—The division of the spoils of a nation, is, then, a sort of domestic arrangement with the honest men who have made themselves masters of it.—"But interest is, in every country, a powerful spring of acceleration; as we may judge from the promptitude with which applications for indemnities have been made from all quarters. That the applications would be numerous was to be expected. They spring up in crowds, at the sound of a single word in the declaration of the mediating powers—the completion of the indemnities; a word which is, nevertheless, very necessary."—Yes! certainly very necessary for the object of one of those powers.—"With the exception of a few princes evidently favored in the plan of indemnities, who amongst them does not pretend to have some claim to this completion? Even among those whose indemnities are incontestably greater than their losses, some are mentioned (and they are not princes without fortune) some are mentioned, I say, who without shame are soliciting for such or such a portion of the spoil of their co-estates. Their greediness was inflamed at beholding the indemnities granted to the margrave of Baden; and, without weighing the excellent reasons given by the minister for exterior relations, whenever they have beheld some propoable arrondissement, some town still free, to be placed under their yoke, they have hastened to demand it, in the same manner as a person demands justice."—*It must be here remembered, that it is not I, who am treating these princes with so much severity, but a paper appearing under the auspices of the French government, and generally understood to be published under the immediate influence of the brother of the government. In fact, what other but this government, the protector of religion and of property, which has caused the one and the other to be respected and re-established in the fortunate countries where the mild influence of her arms has been able to penetrate, could have painted with so much force and so much truth, the scandalous scene which Germany presents, at the present moment, to have assigned to the Prussian territories to the left of the Rhine, viz. nearly 93,000 souls. But the work published at Berlin, which we have several times quoted, modestly estimates it at 122,500, and the revenue at the enormous sum of £156,400 sterling!—By what fatality is this series of transactions, so contrary to the laws of honour, of humanity, and of justice, so injurious to the rights of all sovereigns, so opposite to the letter and the spirit of the treaty of Lunéville, so fatal to the German empire and to all Europe—by what fatality, I say, instead of exciting the strongest opposition of the sovereigns of Europe, is it assisted by some, and tolerated by all? This is, indeed, the most difficult part of my subject.

Incedo per ignes

Suppositos cineri doloso.

I shall, however, endeavour to reconcile my respect for sovereigns with the respect due to truth. This is not the time to remain silent. Europe has but a few moments left to save herself. If she is not made fully sensible of the extent of her danger, she must inevitably be lost!—The consternation into which Buonaparté has thrown Europe, astonished Europe? But the remainder is not less curious.—"And how, amidst all these claimants, who would all have been equally right or equally wrong" (right in complaining of an unjust spoliation, and wrong in making useless complaints) "how would it have been possible to have found out, I will not say any principle of justice, but even any rule of convenience."—In fact, it seems pretty clearly proved, that justice has nothing to do in this transaction, and that the convenience of the plundered princes has been as little consulted.—"Amongst the towns which remain free, there are some which will bear witness to the moderation of the surrounding powers, or the high protection of the mediating powers. Such, for example, is the town of Nuremburgh, anxiously coveted, and, as is well known, more than once threatened by Prussia. When we consider its situation in the centre of the margraviates, whose value and importance it would considerably increase, it is difficult not to consider it as destined to pass, sooner or later, under the dominion of their master." (Some annual doneurs, through the channel of Messrs. X. Y. Z. would be able to retard the catastrophe.) "If it were permitted to make use of a trivial expression on this subject, it might be said, that it was reserved for the thirst of the Prussian eagle."—Here is another peck at the Prussian eagle! One would imagine from this, that the moment for plucking him is at no great distance!—I shall conclude this extract, and the numerous commentaries which it affords, by the following paragraph, in which the nature of the mediation of the French government is unblushingly avowed.—"Austria, which has not beheld, but with the most lively displeasure, the imposing attitude of France and of Russia, must be delighted with all those claims, which appear to be made in order to fetter the progress of their ministers, and the execution of what it calls their advice."—"Note of the Mercury,—Bohemia, in one of her votes, gave it as her opinion, that the declaration of the mediating powers was considered as advice."—And it appears that the French government resolved that it should be looked upon as an order.—This specimen may serve to shew the German princes how lightly their concerns are treated by their friends the French!

* This expression may appear strange: it is nevertheless exact. It is one of Buonaparté's titles. When he was complimented on his return from Marengo, upon that fatal victory, he replied, "that the government was truly sensible of the attachment of the counsels." Now, as nobody has ever suspected Cambaceres or Le Brun, (but only General Desaix) of having contributed to this victory, it must be concluded, that Napoleone Buonaparté and "the government" are synonymous expressions.

undoubtedly explains, in some measure, this singular phenomenon; but there is still some sovereigns whose high courage and exalted power render them incapable of intimidation. That the cabinet of Berlin, carried away by excessive deference for a government it feared, and by the desire of enlarging its possessions, may have forgotten its duty to the empire, and abandoned itself to a system of aggrandizement, in which, for centuries past, it has been but too successful*; that princes, plundered of their all by the chance of war, may have indulged the wish of throwing the weight of those losses upon their innocent neighbours, it is possible to conceive; but there is still a sovereign whom it is impossible for frightened Europe to behold without astonishment, lending the formidable support of his high power, and the imposing authority of his name and his virtues, to a system of iniquity, destructive to the Germanic empire, and fatal to all Europe. This prince, whose immense possessions place him beyond the temptations of ambition, whom all Europe rejoiced to see ascending the throne, invested with all the strength of youth and the prudence of riper years, towards whom she turned her attention as towards her principal bulwark in the terrible crisis which threatens her with general subjugation; this prince, placed by his power and great distance beyond the reach of the turbulent government, which agitates, torments, and humbles Europe; this prince, a stranger to every motive of fear or of personal interest, and called by this very consideration and by his great power, to be the impartial pacificator of Europe, and the restorer of justice, order, and morality; this prince has most undoubtedly been deceived as to the nature of the transactions which have taken place in the Germanic empire; to which he is not united by any other ties than those of protector and preserver. Entirely occupied in the cares of a new reign, and the details of the government of his vast empire, his attention could not be fixed with the same steadiness on affairs which were necessarily secondary to his immediate duties.—It is possible, that accustomed to scatter his favours on all those whom heaven has placed under his dependence, he has not been insensible to the aggrandizement of houses which had the honour to be closely allied to his own; but whatever pleasure his majesty may feel in bestowing favours, he will never cease to be just. If beneficence be a pleasure more peculiarly reserved for sovereigns, justice is no less their highest duty.—If the houses of Baden and Wirtemberg were sufficiently illustrious to give successively two empresses to Russia; if the nations of this vast empire have enjoyed this two-fold choice, whereby they beheld the graces and the virtues seated on the throne of their sovereigns, what could be wanting to complete their lustre? Could the addition of a few bailiwicks, torn by force from their lawful sovereigns, raise them still higher? Could it add in

in any degree to their means of defence? Certainly not; and the accession of a few lots of territory contiguous to their states leaves them no less under the absolute dependency of France. It is not in their own strength that sovereigns of the second order should look for their security. In the respect due to the sacred character of sovereign, in the protection and in the justice of those whom Providence has placed above them in the gradation of power, can they alone find real safety. This transfer of domains, though apparently made in their favour, will, by weakening the lawful influence and real strength of the head of the empire, their real protector, by presenting fresh examples of the destruction of states and of sovereignties, and by inspiring them with ideas of absolute independence incompatible with their individual weakness, prepare the way for their final overthrow; and the moment the chief of the empire shall cease to be able to protect them, that moment will they fall a ready prey to a greedy and all-powerful government: they will add to the crowd of sovereigns, already proscribed by the act of indemnity, but with this difference, that the witnesses of their overthrow, instead of pitying their fate, will only behold in it a just application of the new law of nations, acknowledged by themselves, and accredited by their imprudent cupidity, Legem sibi dixerat ipse.

Who, in fact, does not see, that the vast portion of Germany comprised between France, Prussia, and Austria, which more immediately acknowledged the authority of the head of the empire, but to which he is now made a stranger by this new arrangement, is become the immediate object of French ambition; that it will be the theatre of the first war commenced by Buonaparté or his successor; and that, according to the success of that war, it will be divided by France between the other two powers? So that, in the course of a few years, we shall, very probably, see Bavaria pass into the hands of the house of Austria, as the reward of her assent to the union to France of the countries contiguous to the right bank of the Rhine: for what political bargain ought to surprize us, after we have seen France first of all purchase Louisiana of the king of Spain, pay for it by giving Tuscany, over which she had no legal right, to his relation, the duke of Parma, and afterwards receive it again of the grand duke, in exchange for the archbishoprick of Salzburg; so that strictly speaking, this archbishoprick was the price of Louisiana. From the violent manner in which all the indemnified princes have darted upon their prey, one is almost tempted to imagine that they are themselves sensible they shall only enjoy it for a short period.—I have shewn that the interest of the houses, united by the strongest ties of his imperial majesty the emperor of Russia, ought to have deterred them from these acquisitions, to acquire which they have disputed with so much bitterness. But were these acquisitions even as useful to them as they may become fatal, are not the alliances of blood, whatever influence they may possess over their private affections, subordinate to another species of alliance still more intimate, of a more exalted nature, and of a character, if I may use the expression, sacred? I mean that eternal and unperishable alliance, by which the Deity himself has united the small number of sovereigns of the first order to whom he has delegated his power over the human race. I speak of that sacred association of power, of rights, and of duties, which unites them for one common end, the preservation of social order and the happiness of the human race. It is in this sense that all kings are, as they reciprocally style each other, really brothers.—If we minutely examine the political relations of Russia with her two western neighbours, Austria and Prussia, which separate her from the greater part of Europe, we shall find, that Austria has been the constant and faithful ally of Russia; from whom, in return, she has received numerous good offices; that even since they have become contiguous, and in spite of the natural rivalry between two great empires of the same order, no subject of dispute has ever arisen between them; for we cannot consider as such a few light clouds, occasioned by the almost inevitable incompatibility of the respective agents, and no sooner raised than dispelled; that Austria is the most powerful barrier against the only power that can become formidable to Russia; in short, that the very situation of Austria, Russia between which can be so serviceable to her, and France, whose power and whose hatred she has at once to dread, is a sure pledge of its regard and attention to the former.—On the other hand, we shall find, that Prussia has rarely omitted a favourable opportunity of opposing the interests of Russia; that, recently, she was desirous of tearing from the immortal Catherine the second, the fruits of her victories over the Turks; that, more recently, she assisted the Poles against the form of government they had adopted under the guarantee of Russia; that the greater part of her numerous acquisitions shew how little scrupulous she is, as to the means by which she aggrandizes herself; that so many contradictory treaties made, at one and the same time, with the powers at war, do not permit much confidence to be placed in her alliance; that, above all, Prussia is under the absolute dependence of France; that she was, during the course of the war, and that she will be henceforward, the principal instrument of French ambition; that France retains her by the double tie of fear and of hope; with one hand threatening her possessions between the Rhine and the Weser, or even the Elbe, whilst with the other she presents her that attractive bait, the possession of Hanover; and that France is so much the less fearful of increasing the power of Prussia, as she well knows she can destroy this instrument the moment it becomes useless to her. According to this parallel, which appears correct, would it be the interest of Russia to abandon her ancient and close connexion with Austria, in order to form a new one with France and Prussia? Would it be of any service to her, to destroy the influence of the emperor over the empire, which he can only employ against France so beneficially for Europe, but which he can never turn against Russia, and transfer it to Prussia, which can turn it, under the direction of France, to the destruction of the power of Austria?—It appears impossible that so many powerful motives should not influence the conduct of Russia; the eminent virtues of Alexander the first do not permit Europe in general, and the German empire in particular, to entertain a fear that his august name will ever be united with that of Buonaparté, for the accomplishment of a work of violence and injustice, immediately tending to overthrow the Germanic empire, to sap the foundation of sovereignty itself, by deposing so many sovereigns.

* Far be it from me to insinuate any thing personal against the king of Prussia, whose moral qualities all Europe must respect! But it does not require much experience to know, how difficult it is for a sovereign to shake off the influence of his cabinet, and struggle single-handed against deep rooted prejudices, and a long established system of policy.

without pretext or ceremony, to prepare the submission of Europe, and to bring the arms of victorious France still nearer to the frontiers of Russia. And this hope is the better founded, since there are means, conformable to justice, still left, of favouring the houses in whose fate his imperial majesty, the emperor of Russia, takes so lively an interest, and of procuring them, if not the favours which France is dispensing with so prodigal a hand, at least a compensation equivalent to the real losses they have sustained. These means, as I shall hereafter shew, are in the hands of the house of Austria; and there can be no doubt of his imperial majesty's disposition to furnish fresh proofs of his attachment to Russia, by a renewal of those sacrifices to which he consented on another occasion. But there is not an instant to be lost. If Russia should once suffer the overthrow of the Germanic empire, it will no longer be in its power to revive the Germanic body, whose destruction it could have prevented. Her disjointed territories will have irrevocably passed into the hands of princes immediately dependent on France; all the established principles of equity will have been subverted, the essence of sovereignty destroyed, and its lustre for ever tarnished, by the proscription of so many sovereigns, whom their plunderers acknowledge to be innocent victims (see the 21st sitting of the commission) and, consequently, that they themselves are the guilty plunderers.—The head of the house of Austria, weakened by irretrievable losses, and surrounded by dangers of the most alarming nature, will no longer be able to furnish his quota to the defence of the empire. And let it not be imagined that the possession of a few additional abbeys or imperial towns, granted to the grand duke of Tuscany, in Swabia, will, in any degree, alter this conclusion. These slender concessions, with which the house of Austria may probably be contented in her present abandoned situation, may apparently lessen the injustice of Buonaparté's conduct towards the grand duke, in plundering him of Tuscany in the name of insulted Europe, but they will not add one atom to the real power and defensive strength of Austria; which is evidently the strongest bulwark against the attacks of France.—I have now shewn, in detail, how much this plan of indemnities, forced upon the empire by France, and countenanced by Prussia, who was not ashamed to adduce her eagerness to despoil its co-etates as a proof of her tender solicitude for the good of the Germanic body, takes from the actual forces of the emperor, in order to transfer them to France, already so powerful; that this plan reduces to nothing the influence of his high dignity, that it debases the majesty of that situation, and converts it into a perpetual source of unceasing humiliations, since there is no longer any state in the empire, however mean, that does not possess the power of insulting its head with impunity; secure in the protection of a diet, entirely at the disposition of the inveterate enemies of the house of Austria; that the Austrian possessions, from the mouth of the Narew to the lake of Constance, borders upon Prussia, and lies open to her arms, and to the arms of all the secondary powers of Germany, sharing the indemnities, and united in a league essentially hostile to the emperor; that the whole of this vast extent of frontier, more than 250 German miles (of 15 to a degree) is entirely exposed, excepting a small part, reaching from Galicia to Lusatia, in which Joseph the second had the foresight to erect some fortresses, though fewer in number than those which defend Prussian Silesia; in short, that the Austrian monarchy is so invested by France, by Prussia, and by the powers dependent upon them, and so separated from its own allies, that there is no other secure route, for a courier dispatched from London to Vienna, but by Gibraltar and Trieste (which is a longer and far more uncertain navigation than the passage to America) or by that of the sound and Riga, which is shut up six months of the year, cannot be performed, in the most favourable season, in less than a month, and is entirely dependent on the will of the emperor of Russia.—But tremendous as these dangers are, they are still nothing in comparison of those to which the Austrian monarchy is exposed towards her frontiers in Switzerland and Italy. It is here that the fate of Switzerland, independent of all prejudices for or against the inhabitants of that country, is connected with the general interests of Europe, and, consequently, deserves the serious consideration of all governments. My readers will pardon the details into which I am about to enter, for they are of the highest importance.—The Voralberg (a country in which few troops and still fewer provisions can be risked, from the inconceivable difficulty of withdrawing them by the only road which leads over a branch of the Alps, from the valley of the Rhine to that of the Inn) being attacked at the same moment from Swabia, Switzerland, and the Grisons, could not possibly defend herself; and the troops stationed there to protect her would be forced to retire precipitately into the Tyrol, by the solitary road just mentioned. The Tyrol itself would instantly be completely invested, from Kufstein, the opening of the Inn into Germany, as far as Perin, the opening of the Adige into Italy. In this extensive line of territory, the enemies of the house of Austria, masters of the Engadine, the county of Bormio and Upper Bresciano, are in possession of the head, and consequently of the entrance into all the valleys of the Tyrol, to the north and south of the Alps. Besides, the important passes, of the Tonnel, at the sources of the Oglio, and the Val Anfo, are no longer immediately protected by the emperor, but solely by the new sovereign of Trent; who, at the present moment, is both the brother and friend of the emperor, but whose posterity may hereafter become inimical to the chief of the house of Austria, and will, at all times, possess distinct interests, and a separate and independent administration. These two passes turn the entrance of the Tyrol by the valley of the Adige, and lead by the vale of Sugana, and an excellent road to Bassano and Venice, behind the Austrian army defending the frontier of the Adige. The neutrality of the grand duke would be no security to the Tyrol: for a victorious army never respects the neutrality of a feeble prince. This neutrality, besides, would be fatal to the Austrian armies; since it would cut off the direct communication of the armies acting in Bavaria from those acting towards the Adige, and instead of the direct road from Inspruck to Trent, would oblige them to make a circuit of four times the distance, by Upper Austria, Styria, Carinthia and Venice. Now, there is not a military man who is not fully convinced, that the whole success of the armies of the emperor depends principally on the shortest possible communication being kept up, between the two armies co-operating in Germany and in Italy.

—Supposing, however, that in spite of all these disadvantages of position, the emperor should succeed in securing the entrance of the Tyrol threatened in so many points, the defence of several of which will no longer belong to him; if by any success on the side of Italy, the enemies of the emperor should pass the Adige and drive back the troops defending the entrance into the Venetian territories, all the troops in the Tyrol will have no other means of retreating into the interior of Austria, but by the almost impassable road from Brixen to Villach, by Lientz, if the neutrality of the grand duke should not shut it upon them, or by Kufstein, provided the hostile army in Bavaria, shall not have reached the river Salza.—Thus it will be seen, that every probable chance of success, on the side of Italy, is against hit imperial majesty; for, as long as Switzerland, the Grisons, and the Valais are dependent on France, and Piedmont in her possession, the Cisalpine republic, surrounded and penetrated by her armies, in every direction, principally governed by the despot of France, and the details of that government administered by his creatures, has no choice of her own: she must submit. Thus the weight of the war, and all the exactions necessary for keeping up a vast army must fall, of course, upon the Cisalpine republic and the adjoining countries, so capable from their fertility to support, so incapable, from their weakness, to repel them; and thus does Buonaparté avoid the clamours and discontents of the French nation, on which the weight of these heavy burdens by this means does not fall.—Thus, the lake of Garda, the fortresses of Peschiera and Mantua, the Lower Po, with the extensive marshes enclosed by its different branches, and the fortress of Ferrara in the centre, form, for France, an insurmountable barrier; whilst the Adige, the passage of which has been as often effected as attempted, presents no obstacle. The Adige once crossed, the investiture of the southern Tyrol is complete, and its evacuation thereby compelled; and as the country, from the Adige to the mountains of Carniola and Carinthia, is entirely flat, and defended by no fortresses (for Palma Nuova, in the condition I examined it, does not deserve that name) nor by any river (for the Brenta, the Piave, the Tagliamento, and the Isonzo, are merely torrents, empty as soon as filled) the least decisive success on the banks of the Adige or in the Tyrol, necessarily forces the evacuation of the Tyrol and the Venetian territories, the retreat of the Austrian armies in Carniola and in Carinthia, the loss of Venice and of Trieste, and consequently, of the whole of the marine and the maritime commerce of Austria; and, what deserves some consideration, all communication is thus cut off with her natural and necessary ally, Great-Britain, except by the deserted and almost inaccessible coasts of Dalmatia. All Europe still remembers the alarms excited for the fate of the Austrian monarchy, when, about six years ago, the armies of France, in a situation infinitely less favourable than her present one, penetrated as far as Styria.

The union of Piedmont, and particularly the state of servile dependence to which the French have reduced Switzerland, will keep up a perpetual alarm for the safety of the house of Austria, and, by a necessary consequence, for the independence of the rest of Europe, and even for England herself; against whom, France, when at war with her, will be able to direct all the naval resources of subjugated Europe; and, in time of peace, to prohibit the entrance of her commerce into its ports. If, to the dangers to which Austria is exposed on the side of Switzerland and Italy, are added those which threaten her on the side of Germany and Poland, we shall be convinced, that Austria cannot possibly embrace the order of things which France is desirous to impose on her, without resigning herself, sooner or later, to destruction, and that it is the general interest of Europe to arm, for the purpose of extricating her from this critical situation, by snatching Piedmont and Switzerland from the hands of Buonaparté.—It is not, therefore, so much on her own account, as on its immediate consequences to the general system of Europe, that Switzerland becomes an object of real political interest: Europe, doubtless, has not been, without indignation, a whole nation attacked without cause and without pretext, subdued and completely pillaged, and afterwards voluntarily abandoned to the horrors of a civil war, which had no other object than that of forcing her to throw herself unconditionally into the arms of France. But the fate of Piedmont so wisely governed by sovereigns contemporary with the birth of the state, which they created and supported with such ability; of that country, so unjustly torn from its legitimate sovereign, in direct opposition to the most solemn engagements, treated with so many indignities from the moment it passed under the yoke of France, that at the very time in which Buonaparté, increasing in audacity in proportion as his adversaries become weaker, formally incorporated it with France, he has put it out of the protection of this very empire, for the space of six years, and abandoned its unfortunate inhabitants, during the whole of that term, to the brutality, the rapacity, and the insolence of his satellites;—but the fate of Tuscany, so happy under the paternal protection of the sovereign she has lost, and that of so many other states overthrown, mutilated, or destroyed by the ambition of the French government, must excite the same compassion, as well in favor of the inhabitants as of the sovereigns, and, in proportion to their importance to the safety of Europe, the same political interest.—The independence of Switzerland is, then, an object of the first necessity for the preservation of the Austrian monarchy; but we should grossly deceive ourselves, if we imagined, that were the object, for which the Swiss have lately taken up arms against the bastard government forced upon it by Buonaparté, and accomplished, Switzerland would recover its independence, and that consequently the dangers with which her subjection threatens Austria in particular, and Europe in general, would cease immediately. The major part of the Swiss appear to have been sincerely united by the desire of recovering their ancient distinction of states, to which they are even more attached than to the form of government under which they lived. In fact, with the exception of the small democratic cantons, in all the rest, that is to say, in more than three-fourths of Switzerland, a body of men sufficiently numerous, were desirous of some changes as to this last point, and the confederates have, generally announced an extension of the rights of citizen. Whatever may be the internal modification of their governments, let us suppose them to succeed in their principal object, the re-establishment of the sovereignty of each canton.—

1st. The Valais, with the important passes of the Simplon and the great Saint Bernard, but more particularly the first, which can, by a fine road, conduct, in a few days, the French forces into the heart of the Cisalpine, that is to say to Milan, still remains in the hands of France.—2d. France, by seizing the bishopric of Basle and the country of Bienne, and extending its dominion to the lake of that name and to the Thiel, has penetrated into the very heart of Switzerland; that is to say, into the great valley of the Aar. Her troops can, in a few hours, seize upon Basle, Berne, and Solcure; in two days, upon Lucerne and Freybourg; and in three days, at farthest, upon Zurich itself; so that, at the expiration of this short interval, all the principal towns of Switzerland, as well as the principal cantons, will have been conquered; and, from the first day, the forces extending from Solcure to Burgdorf at the entrance of the Emmenthal, will completely divide Switzerland into two parts; of which two parts, the southern can derive no succour from the other but by the mountains.—3d. The Pays de Vaud, which has taken up arms, and supported the war of the central government against the federal government, which the rest of Switzerland is calling for, furnishes Buonaparté with a specious pretext for detaching from Switzerland, a country, differing from it in language and in manners, and nourishing a rooted antipathy, which the recent events have, most assuredly, not tended to extinguish. This country, hemmed in, besides, by France, from which it draws its corn and salt, and to which it disposes of its cattle and cheese, cannot shake off a dependence, rendered so complete, both by strength and by interest. It is also necessary to Buonaparté for the passage of troops marching from Franche-Comté, Alsace and the north of France, into the Milanese by the Simplon. Buonaparté has the choice of either making it a separate republic, nominal and dependant, like the pretended republic of the Valais, of uniting them all in one, under one general denomination, or of taking it to himself by a formal annexation to France. Is it likely that the Swiss cantons, having obtained what they demand, the re-establishment of their respective sovereignties, would again take up arms, or even venture upon the least remonstrance for the recovery of French Switzerland? This being the case, a formal or at least a real union to France, of all the country extending from Bienne through Morat and Fribourg as far as the Valais, must be considered as highly probable. More than two years ago, was this union traced upon the public maps of Switzerland; and what other object could Buonaparté have, in exciting a civil war in a country over which he was absolute master, unless to find in it a pretext for an usurpation, which the peaceable state of Switzerland would have rendered too scandalous; if, indeed, any thing coming from that man may henceforward be considered as an object of scandal! Buonaparté, it is well known, secured to himself, through Spain, to which it never belonged, the possession of the duchy of Parma, even without the knowledge of the duke; why, then, should he not take to himself the Pays du Vaud, by means of the good marriage of Baden, as he is pleased to call him? The dukes of Zehringue, chiefs of the elder branch of the house of Baden, were in possession of it:

until the year 1213, the epoch of the death of Berchtold the 5th, the last duke of that race. The claim to this title would be full as good as those he possesses over his other states.

4th. If Switzerland, in its utmost strength, could not, four years ago, defend itself, for one month, against a moderate French army; now that this same Switzerland is robbed of the countries of the Valais, of Bienne, of the Vaud, and of Geneva; now that it is subdivided afresh into fifteen or eighteen small independent states, between which their very number, and still more their diversity of manners, of religion, of interests, and of forms of government, admit of no well concerted operations, and in each of which, if we except the small cantons, there will henceforth be two avowed factions, the one friendly, the other inimical to the restoration of the ancient form of government, and animated against each other, the one by recent injuries and regret at what it has lost, the other by the ambition of realizing all its pretension—can it be imagined, I say, that Switzerland, in this state of discord,—stripped of its arsenal, its treasures, its magazines, in a word, of all the fruits of a long and wise administration, and of that glory, with which the remembrance of the victories of Sempach, Granson, and Morat invested it, and, last of all, attacked by an enemy, against whom the ancient dukes of Austria and of Burgundy would not have dared to have taken up arms—will be able to resist the victorious armies of France, freed from every other contest, and dictating the law to almost all the powers of Europe? Surely it is supposed that the Swiss are so many invulnerable giants, similar to those placed by the imagination of Homer in the caverns of Etna! We forget, then, that at the first word uttered by citizen Rapp, a species of buffoon at the court of Saint Cloud, these same victorious Swiss fell back from Lausanne to Schwitz still more rapidly than they had advanced, and that in so doing they only followed the imperious dictates of necessity. If, in spite of this inequality, the Swiss, forgetting their own inferiority in their desire of revenge, should persist in the struggle, without the aid of allies more powerful than themselves, the history of their ancestors acquaints us with the fate that awaits them; it is traced by Tacitus, in sections 67 and 68, of the first book of his Annals, with traits of resemblance so very striking, that they almost induce us to imagine, that Tacitus was writing of the time of Buonaparté and not of Vitellius*.

* Plus prædæ ac sanguinis Cæcina hausit: irriterant turbidum ingenium Helvetii, Gallica gens, olim armis virisque, mox memoria nominis clara. . . . Vitellii imperium abnuentes. Initium bello fuit avaritia ac festinatio unæ et vicesimæ Legionis; ruperant pecuniam. . . . Ægrè id passi Helvetii. . . . Cæcina belli avidus, proximam quamque culpam, antequam pœniteret, ultum ibat; mota prope castra; vastati agri. . . . missi ad Rhœtici auxilia nuntii, ut versos in legionis Helvetios a tergo aggrederebantur.—Illi ante discrimen feroces, in prælio pavidî, quamquam primo tumultu claudium severum ducem legerant, non arma noscere, non ordines sequi, non in unum consilere. Exitiosum adversus veteranos prælium, intuta obsidio dilapsis vicitate membris. Hinc Cæcina cum valido exercitu, inde Rhœticæ alæ cohortesque . . . undique populatio et cædes. Ipsi in medio vagi,

Thus the most lively imagination can discern no probable chance of success for the Swiss in this dreadful contest, which may lead to the destruction of their population, by a man, proud, stubborn, and vindictive, who wishes to frighten for ever the nations he has placed under his yoke, and to retain them in that yoke by means of a terrible example.—But even supposing, against every shadow of reason and of common sense, that the Swiss are both able and willing to resist the arms of France with some success; how will Switzerland, pressed in its whole length between Transalpine and Cisalpine France, deriving, from both, the greatest part abjectis armis, magna pars saucii aut palantes, in montem Vocetium perfrugere: ac statim immissa cohorte depulsi . . . per silvas atque in ipsis latebris trucidati, multa millia hominum cæsa, multa sub coronâ venum data . . . missi qui dederent civitatem et deditione accepta; in Julium Alpium, ut concitorem bellii, Cæcina animadverit: ceteros benivæ vel sævitie Vitellii reliquit.—Cæcina marked his way with greater rapine and more horrible cruelty than his predecessors: this turbulent spirit had been irritated by the Swiss, originally a Gallic nation renowned for their valour and their exploits in war. They refused to acknowledge the authority of Vitellius. In this disposition of their minds they had soon a cause of quarrel, occasioned by the rapacity of the legions, who had carried off a sum of money belonging to the Swiss. An act of violence so unwarranted, raised the indignation of the people, who determined on making reprisals. Thus, to such a man as Cæcina, was ample provocation. He wished for nothing so much as a pretence for open hostility. He marched against the Helvetians, and having laid waste the country, not content with this act of revenge, he sent dispatches into Rhœtia, with orders to the auxiliaries to hang upon the rear of the Helvetians, while he advanced to attack them in front.—The spirit of the Helvetians, fierce and intrepid, while the danger was at a distance, began to droop as soon as the war drew nearer. In the beginning of these hostilities, they had chosen Claudius Severus to command their forces, but terror and confusion followed. To keep their ranks in battle was not their practice, nor were they able to act in concert with their united force. The contest, they now perceived, must be unequal with a veteran army; and their fortifications being every where in decay, to stand a siege was not advisable. Cæcina advanced at the head of a numerous army; the cavalry and the auxiliary forces from Rhœtia, with the youth of that country in their rear. This short war was a continued scene of massacres and pillage. The country was laid waste. The Helvetians betook themselves to flight; and, after wandering about in a general panic, wounded, maimed, and unable to resist, they threw down their arms and fled to the mountains. The soldiers of Cæcina were sent to dislodge them. Driven from their strong holds, they betook themselves to the woods, or fled to their lurking places; several thousands were put to the sword or sold to slavery. At last, the inhabitants sent deputies offering to surrender their unfortunate country. Their submission was accepted. Julius Alpinus, one of the leading chiefs, was put to death. The rest were left to the mercy or resentment of Vitellius.

of its corn, rice, salt, metals, and the materials of its manufactures, drawing the surplus from the states of Baden, Wirtemberg, and Bavaria, evidently under the dependence of France, having no markets for its natural or artificial productions, but in the vast states of its enemy, or in those of her humble dependents; how, I say, will Switzerland be able to resist that tacit war, which will be waged in every point of its frontier, not by the soldiers, but by the contraband guards of Buonaparté. Subdued by famine, and by universal scarcity, will it not be obliged, like the Egyptians formerly, to go and supplicate for slavery at the feet of this new Pharaoh? The independence of Switzerland is, then, a creature of the imagination, an ideal being, until Italy shall be entirely set free from the yoke of France. —From all that I have hitherto said, I am entitled, since I have proved them, to deduce the following conclusions, sufficiently important to be repeated, and, I will venture to say, engraved over the entrance-door of the cabinets of all sovereigns. —1st. That if the empire of Germany should take the new shape which the ambition of Buonaparté, seconded by the cupidity of Prussia, wishes to impose upon it, the Austrian power is not only paralysed as to its defence of Europe, but exposed also to habitual alarm for her own safety. —2d. That as long as Switzerland and Italy shall remain under the dependence of France, so long will the Austrian power be threatened, in its very existence. 3d. That the slavery of Switzerland cannot be modified, by any of the interior forms which Buonaparté may be graciously pleased to permit it to take; but solely by the reduction of the power of France, and above all, by her total expulsion out of Italy; which necessarily includes the re-establishment of the kingdom of Piedmont, not only in its antient power, but with all the aggrandizements that opportunity and justice may afford. —4th. That the union of these two causes of danger, viz. the subjection of Switzerland and Italy to France on one side, and, on the other, the new Prussian confederacy, uniting nearly all the forces of Germany in one hostile league against the emperor, condemns Austria to exist in so perpetual a state of alarm, that there is nothing which she ought not to undertake, rather than submit to an order of things which assures her speedy destruction; that a few paltry additions to the equivalent intended for the grand duke of Tuscany, neither diminishes, nor retards, nor even palliates the danger; that the only means of salvation for the Austrian monarchy, is to risk every thing for the preservation of the legal constitution of the empire, or to re-establish it, the moment a favourable opportunity presents itself. —5th. That the destruction, or complete subjection of this great and respectable power, will place the small number of sovereigns, who shall survive this dreadful crisis, in a situation far more perilous, even than that in which the Austrian monarchy is now placed; since they will have to defend themselves, single-handed and without the assistance of Austria, against France, with all the west of Europe in its train, and become, in reality, The Great Western Nation, as Buonaparté, with an affectation which unveils the secret views of his ambition and vanity, has, for some time past, called it. —6th. That the preservation of the Austrian power, and consequently, on one side the recovery of Switzerland and Italy, and the restoration of the kingdom of Piedmont; and on the other, the preservation of the states of the Germanic body, are measures of the highest importance, even to those powers, who appear to be the least interested, namely, Great-Britain and Russia. —What! (will exclaim all those German princes on whom the reverses and the losses of the war have fallen), is it possible that the grand principle of the indemnities should be rejected! Can it be doubted, that it is for our innocent neighbours to support all our losses, real or imaginary, voluntary or forced? —Yes; the voice of equity, more energetic than that of avarice, denounces this principle to the world at large, as subversive of the stability of states, as inimical to the established law of nations. It challenges the most ingenious sophist to find, in the established laws and usages of Germany, any precedent for this iniquitous system. But, to conclude, honour points out to these princes the real spot on which their indemnities stand. It tells them, that they ought alone to seek for them in the possessions of the ravisher; but if danger affright; if necessity speak a language more powerful than honour, they must resign themselves to their fate, forget what they have lost, through want of fortitude and unanimity, and endeavour to preserve what yet remains, by a conduct the reverse of what they have hitherto observed. —Every individual is convinced of the infamy of the principle of the indemnities. The dangers of its application have been so fully exposed, as to leave no possible doubt relative to the fatal consequences, which must await on such a mischievous plan. What motive, what consideration, then, can induce the sovereigns of Europe to support claims, so fatal and so unjust? And after all, where is the great mischief to them, if the king of Prussia no longer possesses the petty territories of Meurs and Guelders? What great harm can accrue to Europe, if the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel have lost the rock of Rhinels, and the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, the castle of Parmesans, &c. &c.? If their princes valued their possessions so much, why did they not make proportionate efforts to defend them? Or why do they not fly to arms, jointly with the head of the empire, whom they have abandoned; with Holland, which is regularly plundered by the commissaries of the French government; with Switzerland, which is in the possession of, and trampled upon by, French soldiers; with Piedmont, fallen from the mild dominion of the sovereigns, to writhe under the sword of special commissioners; with Italy, oppressed and laid waste; with England, which for so long a time, single handed and without allies, contended against the common enemy, and which, ever victorious, retired from the struggle, without any other loss than what it voluntarily sacrificed at the shrine of peace; and, finally, with all Europe, with the whole world, oppressed, desolated, tormented, insulted, or threatened, by men who dare every thing, because their will is neither contested nor opposed? —What was ever more absurd than the proposed principle of the indemnities? Is there a common fund set apart by nature for the purpose of making compensation for the evils which successful violence shall inflict? And again, is that fund situated only in Germany? Now if there be no such fund, the slightest usurpation must overthrow all states; for, from neighbour to neighbour, the system of indemnity will make the tour of the whole globe; and who, in this sense of the word, was ever indemnified for their losses? Has the family of the king of France, murdered by his own subjects on whom he had poured every favour, been indemnified for the loss of the most noble as well as most ancient inheritance in Europe? No! on the contrary, they have not yet been even revenged! And we have seen the r place successively filled by their assassins, and the tools of their assassins, and their patrimony and their palaces become the reward of innocent blood. Has the king of Sardinia been indemnified for Piedmont, of which he was deprived by a banditti at the dead hour of night, and at a moment of profound peace? No! no! He waits trembling at Cagliari till his plunderers shall snatch from him the last domain of his illustrious house. Has the pope received an indemnity, for the loss of a third part of his states? The king of Spain, for Louisiana and Saint Domingo? And the emperor himself, has he been indemnified for the loss of the Netherlands? No; the fortune of war has transferred to one side, what it has taken from the other: and it remains, for resolution and for courage, to destroy what she has accomplished.

Extract from "Etat Commercial de la France, au Commencement du Dix-Neuvième Siècle; ou du Commerce Français, de ses anciennes Erreurs, et des Améliorations dont il est susceptible. Par J. Blanc de Volz. 3 tom. 8vo. Paris. 1803." Containing Strictures on Mr. Dundas's Speech, respecting the relative interests of France and England in England.

It is imagined that the establishment of a French East India company would alarm England, and perpetually keep her on the watch: Now if we consider the enormous power of Great Britain in the East, "would it," say these politicians, "would it be in the power of France to establish a company invested with power to resist the vexation of the English? Certainly not.... it would, therefore, be impolitic to create a company pretending to make themselves feared and respected.... While, on the other hand, England will behold without jealousy our merchants carrying on a separate commerce in the country over which she dominates.... the surest means of maintaining peace with England, is to avoid every thing that can lead to a rupture in India," and doubtless, to submit passively to all the arrogant terms that these Islanders may wish to impose on us.—At the moment when France has so recently signed the most glorious peace that ever adorned her political calendar, it appears almost incredible that so servile a submission to the will of England could have been recommended to her, for the purpose of preserving peace!

I hesitated a considerable time before I ventured to speak of the utility of a French company in a political point of view: this enquiry is closely connected with considerations which ought to be touched upon with the utmost delicacy, at the moment when harmony has so recently, and so happily, been restored to the two countries. Nevertheless, as there is no longer any secrets in politics, which the attentive observer will not dive into,

I trust I may be permitted to lift up, with a cautious hand, the veil which at present conceals those secrets from us. The projects undertaken and executed by England in India, as well as those which she now meditates, are but too well known: they have been too often repeated in the two houses of her parliament, to render a discussion of it in this place improper.—In a point of view purely political, the sovereignty of the English company is little more in India than an insignificant lure for Europe, and the government is the invisible soul of its operations. Embracing the three points of the angle which forms the peninsula from Bombay to cape Comorin, and from cape Comorin to Calcutta, without even forgetting Ceylon, which she has just added to her dominions, England appears henceforward to have no rival to fear in that quarter. Her influence is equally powerful in the interior, where she possesses millions of subjects, and few declared enemies; and where she has established commercial relations with all the princes of that vast continent. Her plans and her influence extend to all the Archipelagos of the Indian Ocean, from the Maldives to Otaheite, from Japan to Botany Bay; possessing every where forts, troops, factories, and presidencies; she every where dictates the law, and her gigantic arms seem to embrace the whole universe. Such is the actual commercial, military, and political situation of Great Britain in Asia; and the picture is by no means too highly coloured!

And to this colossal power what have we to oppose but future plans and projects, but remembrances of our past power and importance in the happy days of Duplex and La Bourdonnaye. But, notwithstanding all this, Asia will henceforth have so great an influence in the maritime and commercial interests of Europe, that we neither can nor ought to neglect her, and the principles of true policy oblige us to claim the share of power which we ought to possess in that quarter of the globe.—There is little reason to doubt, that the English, masters of the peninsula, have, independent of their real power, endeavoured to increase their influence in the different Soubahs, at the expense of our own. During the war, they doubtless have not failed to represent us as a nation shorn of its antient splendor, incapable of entering into a commercial rivalryship with them, and for ever eclipsed by their own power. And their success with the credulous Asiatics will have been the greater; since, masters for a long time of our factories, they will have represented the invasion and temporary enjoyment of them, as the act of their acknowledged superiority.

At the conclusion of peace, the English have restored to us our plundered possessions; but it is not this which disturbs them. The Aldees (the towns and villages) composing the territory of Pondicherry, Kanial and Chandernagor, the post of Cochin, which they tell us we have obtained; in short, is it not a territory more or less extended, and every where surrounded by the possessions of their own company; it is not all this that can alarm Great Britain. But what must alarm her, is the power we possess of again opening our ancient communications, and of regaining our consideration and our influence:—what does alarm them, is the courage and the confidence with which our presence and the hope of our protection, may one day inspire the Indian Princes, who have been tyrannized over and plundered.

* Memoir of the council of commerce at Bourdeaux.

Nay, has not the English Government in India recently stained itself with a most odious act of plunder and injustice in the person of the nabob of the Carnatic? Let us judge of this fact by the well founded reproaches excited against the agents of the company in their own country. "It is in vain for us" says the Morning Chronicle of June last (1802), "to tax the ambition of our neighbours, when we have in so short a space gained an empire containing fifty millions of people. One acquisition has been followed by another, and the resentment of one usurpation has furnished the pretence for a new attack. The circle is widening, and while the system of conquest is continued, the evil must grow worse and worse. The system is unjust and detestable. The difference of manners, the distance of the object, our ignorance of the men weaken our sympathy with their wrongs! The deposition of a petty German sovereign, the usurpation of a state in Italy by France rouses all our indignation; but we think nothing of the degradation of independent princes, and the annexation of whole kingdoms in the East. We declaim against the insolence of a French Consul, but we overlook the wanton freaks of power displayed by the pro-consuls of a set of merchants of England. There is no end to their acts of violence. While a single independent power remains in India, each year will produce scenes like those which lately passed in Oude and the Carnatic. It is high time that justice, as well as policy should interpose; for if these things continue, perpetual troubles must ensue, and ill-gotten dominion must be maintained by eternal war. What will be the case when European aid is added to the discontents of Asia?"

Such are the complaints excited by a sentiment of justice, even in England; and are not all the countries in the world subject, henceforward, to the common laws of a similar policy? And all the sovereigns of Europe casting so jealous an eye towards the aggrandizement of their rivals, will they limit their narrow views to the territories that surround them, and suffer a new and immense empire founded at a distance, to escape their vigilance, their jealousy, or even their justice?—Can the English themselves expect that all the states of Europe, and, above all, that France, will behold the completion of this iniquitous system of spoliation, without making one effort to oppose them? Most assuredly they will not. At the peace of Amiens, the antient treaties were not renewed, consequently, the usurpations obtained in India, without even striking a blow, have not been acknowledged or confirmed, and our government have not abandoned their acquired possessions. The funds of a company would turn these possessions to the advantage of France; whilst a free trade will condemn us to vegetate on the banks of the Ganges, without honour and without security. The people of the East, we well know, are led away more than any other people, by exterior magnificence, and the consideration we shall hereafter enjoy among them, will be in proportion to the opinion we give them of our own importance. Shall we again repair to the coasts of Asia, without carrying with us those marks of greatness which ought to accompany us thither? Shall our commerce be confined to a few individual and remote expeditions, which only betray our weakness? In restoring our commerce, is it right that its exertions should be limited by the mediocrity of the capitals which will at first be employed in it, and checked in its progress by an uncertainty of success which it is highly necessary to find a period to?—If our annual expeditions to the two sides of the Peninsula, or the Ganges, differ in no respect from those of the Danes and the Swedes, will not the nations of Hindostan consider us of the same importance in the scale of nations? Can they place any degree of confidence in us when they behold so vast a difference between our power and the power of England? And can the agents of government themselves, expect to be treated with respect, if they are unaccompanied by the splendor which imposes respect and secures confidence? In short, if the situation of the state is such, that it can afford but a barren protection to the trade of India, will it be too much to assert, that this commerce, deprived of all the advantages of which it is capable, becomes injurious to the state, and ought to be proscribed by severity? since it no longer answers any of the ends which render a prosecution of it beneficial to France. But if it be true that the commerce of India is indispensably necessary to the ulterior development of the power of France; if the dangers of this commerce, supposing it free, are positive, we must necessarily conclude that it ought to be concentrated in the hands of a company; that the moment of peace is favorable for seizing upon all our rights; and, lastly, that period is arrived for regaining all that we have lost.—If it be necessary to adduce a proof of this, I beg leave to remind my readers of the language of Mr. Dundas, in the house of commons, on the 12th of May last.—"It is true that the treaty of Amiens restores to the French a few factories, but it will always depend on us to limit her trade, or whether she shall carry on any trade at all. We are completely masters of that country, and have a right to regulate all its concerns. If the French were to advance unwarrantable pretensions would we not resist them? If they were to fortify their factories, would not we be justified in throwing down these fortifications? Being under no engagements whatever, have we not the power to establish in our own dominions what regulations we think proper? Before the French can buy a bale of goods, they must come to us as supplicants, and first obtain our permission. They can enjoy no advantage, for which they are not indebted to our favor and indulgence."—And to this state of abject subjection are we counselled to submit, by not establishing a company! What! is it at the moment when the English company is in possession of one part of India and makes the other tremble, is it at this moment that we are counselled to carry on in that country, a precarious and secret commerce at the good pleasure of the English?—Is it with reason that we invoke that liberty which commerce ought to enjoy, for the purpose of favoring a few French merchants at the expence of those extensive measures which government must take in order to secure general prosperity, and to attain that pre-eminence which has been announced to us? To revive our connections in the East, a commercial plan is not alone sufficient; a political one must also be united to it, of which all the parts closely combined to each other, may secure the motion and action of both. This is what the interest of the state demands, what a free trade cannot offer, but what the assistance of a company might tend to create.

Great Britain by her navy and her possessions in India, undoubtedly possesses advantages which we cannot counterbalance. But is this a reason which ought to deter us from having recourse to the only possible means of diminishing the inferiority of our position? Is it not, on the contrary, a sufficient motive for the establishment of a company which alone can, in the course of time, alleviate us from the burden of dependence?

Besides this, have we not reason to suppose that the respective commercial interests of the two nations will give rise to frequent explanations, to warm discussions, and probably, at a future period, to a fresh rupture? For however solemn treaties may be, they not only are not eternal, but they have no other guarantee for their stability, than the reciprocal interest which induced the parties to ratify them, or that of strength which alone can prevent the infringement of them.—We ought, also to remember, that the English company in India will multiply the shackles, the oppositions, and very probably the vexations which our commerce will necessarily have to experience in that quarter, unless our traders, in the miserable hope of eventual profits, "present themselves," to use the expression of Mr. Dundas, "as supplicants."—Our merchants as well as our captains will be so much the more cautious, or rather the more timid, since, at the least sign of resistance, they would be overpowered by their enemy: for the least pretext, the slightest error, the most trivial encroachment on what the English company is pleased to call their rights, (but which are not so in our estimation) all in short, will excite her clamours, and give rise to measures which are by no means new to her.—And will not this motive for perpetual alarm, damp the ardor of our privateers? Will they venture upon expeditions so hazardous without a guarantee, and on the bare faith of the good pleasure of the English? Certainly not; prudence dictates to our commerce very different principles!—Thus, the carrying on a free trade would be extremely precarious, and its resistance become useless against the superior pretensions of the English; it can neither be beneficial to itself nor to the state; while, on the other hand, the utility of a company is not even a matter of doubt. The advantages which the government hopes to derive from it will be accomplished by it in all the public or private acts in which it will be able to assist her, without the necessity of any thing but her protection in case of any daring attack upon it.—But even in this point of view, will not the assistance of the government be the same, will it not have the same duties to fulfil in protecting our commerce, whether a company does or does not exist?—Besides, it is certain that our establishments in India, in their present state, cannot take any consistent attitude, but by the earnest desire of the government to re-model them, and by the aid of a powerful company. Such a company, strong in all the pecuniary means which she will have to appropriate to the aggrandizement of her commerce, will be able to struggle with fewer disadvantages against the monopolizing projects of the English company; and strong in the unity of views and of interests, it will always second the views of the government, and can never be offensive to it. In short, a uniform state of harmony subsisting between the delegates of the government, and its own agents, will necessarily augment their respective strength.—Undoubtedly, our company will not have the means of becoming equally powerful as the English company, and it is to be hoped it would have the wisdom not to attempt it. Had it even the ambition to become so, its interest would be sufficient to deter it from it. More cautious in its proceedings, and better informed than the isolated privateer, it will be more able to protect its rights, and, in case of necessity, more powerful in supporting them: it will be furnished with far greater resources to resist the haughty pretensions of the enemy; and whilst a commerce carried on by individuals, lost as it were, in the centre of the Indian ocean, and on inhospitable coasts, where it is repulsed by the iron hand of monopoly, could not dare to venture but with the most timid circumspection; a company more powerful in its progress, and better supplied with the means of resistance, would be able to defend itself against any opposition; and it is even probable that beneficial connections might add to its individual resources, and ultimately tend to render the English company either more moderate, or more just in its pretensions.—In short, the establishment of a French East India company alone presents us with the prospect of one day restoring our annihilated commerce, and our lost consideration, whilst to declare free the commerce of India would be to condemn us in Asia to perpetual slavery; to sanction the monopoly of the English; to render us indefinitely tributary to them; to interdict us from every means of regaining our rights by our influence; to sacrifice the interest of the state to the mercantile vanity or the private interests of a few merchants; in short, to endanger our very existence in India, and probably to furnish Europe with a reason to imagine that there exists between our government and the cabinet of Saint James, secret articles which impose upon us the obligation of establishing no company in India: a humiliating condition, to which we have assuredly not subscribed in the most glorious treaty that France ever signed with the proud Britons.—Such are the motives on which are founded the necessity of confiding the commerce of India to one company, under the immediate protection of the government. Even Raynal himself, the irreconcilable enemy of privileges, after the most virulent declamation against the abuses and the dangers with which they are attended, is, nevertheless, obliged to acknowledge, that the commerce of India can never be successfully carried on, but by a regular, privileged company.—To conclude, the hope of one day beholding our re-exportation exceed our internal consumption adds to the necessity of concentrating our strength, if we aspire to render the commerce of India as profitable as it has hitherto been injurious to us; and this, the only object of all our connections with India, is utterly impossible by a free trade.

I have expressed myself on this subject with the frankness which the importance of the subject demanded: it is probably that my opinions may be in opposition to the private views of a few merchants; but I am inclined to believe that they accord with the true principles of commerce.

Some Account of the Seasons in 1802.

Though this may fairly be classed among what we commonly call good years, it is marked, however, by three singular periods in the weather, which do not always occur, even in seasons the most genial or austere, as will appear from the following general remarks, which were regularly committed at the close of each separate month, by an inhabitant of the county of Lincoln, who, for some years, has taken pleasure in observing those deviations of the times which operate so powerfully on the produce of the earth.—Jan. Three first weeks, frost and snow, but not extreme. On the 20th, about nine at night, it began and rained violently from the south, till succeeded by a storm of wind from the west, which raged with unabated fury to the evening of the 21st. Several tempests within these 25 years have risen much higher, and been more tremendous for a time, particularly one on new year's day, 1795, and on the 8th of Nov. 1796; but the oldest person existing probably never witnessed any instance of a storm continuing at such a pitch so many hours in succession. As the rudest and severest blasts in winter are for the most part succeeded by mild and gentle weather, so at this crisis, the last week of the month in temperature and dryness was scarcely inferior to April.—Feb. More dry than usual.—March. Bright days, cutting winds, cold nights, no rain, no hail, no snow.—April. Tepid showers. On the 27th it rained moderately throughout the whole day.—May. So excessively dry, that the uplands began to be considerably distressed, and all men began to cry out for rain. Several nights' frosts, unusually severe at so advanced a period, conducted to check all sorts of artificial vegetation.—June. Fine moderate rain at the beginning of the month. Last part dry and warm.—July. Cold, comfortless, and wet throughout, which fell more in the shape of mild and set rains, than of rapid and heavy torrents. Six days only in 30 Fahrenheit attained to 70 deg. a circumstance almost unexampled at this season. Neither corn nor fruit, nor any kind of vegetation made the least progress. All things aggregately considered, seemed to forebode the repetition of the evils of 1800.—Aug. Set in with a prospect no better than that which had closed the preceding month. It still rained. On Wednesday the 4th, however, it cleared about the break of day, when a new and cheerful scene suddenly expanded to our view, which immediately dispersed a ray of gladness over the whole surface of our island. Dry, fine, and hot days, without any variation, came in one after another quite through the month. The heat, however, was not excessive, for Fahrenheit on a western wall never exceeded 95 deg. where, not two years before, it was equal to 118 deg.—Sept. No rain, no wind. Sunday the 12th was noted for a degree of cold, which very rarely occurs between the vernal and autumnal equinox. At 7 a. m. Fahrenheit was depressed to 2 deg. below freezing, in the very same place where not a week before it had been up at 95. The effects of this unparalleled severity at so early a period, was visible on all vegetable life, more particularly on the standing oats, on the cole, on the turnips, and even in immured gardens on esculents of all sorts.—Oct. Instead of heavy rains and high winds, the usual forerunners of winter at this season, we had moderate showers, gentle gales and light frosts.—Nov. After such a series of dry and fine weather, every one seemed now more than commonly impressed with an idea that this month, generally the most gloomy in the year, must, of course, now, come forth clad in its sable mantle, and loaded with all the previous terrors of winter. Contrary to common expectation, it proved what is too recent in the minds of observing men to repeat, and for which we cannot be too thankful to that all-powerful and good Being, who, in his own due season, covers the earth with snow, and scattereth the hoar frost like ashes.—Dec. Though this last division of the year has not passed without some greater variety in the weather, still it has certainly been much milder, and enlivened by a greater number of clear days, than usually occur in such a season, of which Thursday 30th was a very cheerful instance.—1st. Of the periods alluded to above, commenced on the 21st of January and extended to July. This, in a general view, with little exception, may fairly be considered as one series of dry and fine weather of five months duration.—2d. Includes the entire cold and cheerless month of July.—3d. Began on Wednesday, 4th of August, and extended to the early morning of the 28th of December, when was a greater quantity of downfall in a given space, than had happened from the 20th of the preceding January.—What effect these striking peculiarities in the year may have had already, or what they are calculated, in the course of God's providence, still further to produce, every considerate person in the different divisions of our extensive province, on soils different from each other, will be best able to determine. The writer of the above cannot close the subject without observing, that the Aurora Borealis, which, by some is esteemed an indication of fine weather, has been frequently and remarkably prevalent since the autumnal equinox, and that, on Monday, 13th Dec. about 7 p. m. it exceeded any thing of the kind he had witnessed many years. For some minutes from the northern horizon to near the zenith, where it began to break and vanish, the whole space, as far as the eye could wander, was one uniform space of pallid fire. As soon as this broke, deeper and denser flashes, of the colour of terrestrial matter, crossed and brandished in every direction; but with a general approximation towards the south, and disappeared entirely in about twenty minutes.
